MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN SYRIA.

How an Eastern Maiden is Betrothed—A Bride's Personal Wealth—Marriage Among the Poor—Social Status of Syrian Women.

IF an artist, in the search for the picturesque, should look the whole world over, he would probably accord to the East the palm of pre-eminence, no less for the grandeur of its natural scenery, and the weird, ghostlike, antiquity of its cities, hoary with centuries, than for the peculiar personality of its people, in the matter of dress, facial expression and social surroundings. While all else, and especially the West, have progressed with the passing generations, the East has stood still; and throughout a very large part of those countries that are comprehensively described as "The Orient," the same general picture greets the traveler to-day as that which was presented possibly a thousand years ago. This is true in detail of almost everything that pertains to the social life and economy of the people; their food, dress, dwellings, manners, language, customs and traditions having undergone hardly any perceptible change, save possibly in a few of the larger cities, where increasing contact with Europeans or other strangers has somewhat modified the old conditions. The East of to-day is the East of the past, for there is apparently some subtle quality in the Oriental mind and character which clings to the old and disdains the new, and places a higher estimate upon ancient usage, legend and tradition than anything that leads to progress or change.

In Syria, this race peculiarity is strikingly noticeable. Social usages, such as those that belong to dress, betrothals, weddings, festivals, funerals and the like, are apparently changeless. In the photograph on this page, two Syrian women of the peasant class are shown, just as they may have come from marketing. They are fair types of thousands who are to be found in the villages and hamlets of Palestine; hard workers, who lead simple and very frugal lives that have but little of sunshine in them. Yet their parents and grand-parents lived and dressed just as they do. Their quiet, patient faces show no sign of discontent or unsatisfied vanity, although the calico dresses they wear so gracefully would be scorned by the lowliest working-woman of the western world. There is something almost Madonna-like in those calm, restful faces, framed in white, transparent gauze—something that marks them as distinct from the Moslem women, with their almost coquettish veils; from the Druse maids and matrons, with their fantastic "tantura," or horned head-dress, and the infinite variety of veils including the "milayah" worn by the women of Egypt, the "burko" or face-veil, and the "yashmak," familiar throughout the Turkish dominions. But the Syrian women, poor and rich, while they may omit the veil at home or during the performance of domestic duties, generally wear it when they go visiting, the married women wearing dark veils and the young girls white silk or calico, according to social position.

Betrothal and marriage are the two chief events in the life of a Syrian girl, the former being a ceremony to which great importance is attached. Rarely are the young people permitted to meet each other before their union has been decided upon by the relatives, who arrange the betrothal compact. It is hardly possible to conceive of any real sentiment existing between the parties before marriage; the Eastern idea is that mutual affection will follow the relation. In Upper Syria, as well as in some parts of Egypt, the betrothal ceremony is a peculiarly interesting one. A mother pays a round of visits, with the purpose of finding a suitable wife for her son. One by one the eligible daughters of suitable families are allowed by their parents to be seen by the visitor. There is a great show of timidity and bashfulness, before they permit the prospective mother-in-law to see their faces. When report is made, and the youth makes choice of one to whom he wishes to be betrothed, the next step is to settle the amount of the dowry. This adjusted, the father of the bride-to-be pledges his faith to the bride-groom's father that his daughter "shall be a slave to your son; a servant of his servant, and her life and honor shall be under his feet." In return, the youth's parent pledges himself that his son "is willing to take her for his companion; and he wants her to stand by his side through life." The form of the ceremony varies but little throughout Syria.

SYRIAN WOMEN OF THE LOWER CLASS.

At the wedding, whether the families be rich or poor, a brave show of wealth and finery is made. Some brides are encumbered with all the jewelry and coins they can possibly carry on arms, neck, head-dress and bodice. These valuables are regarded as a bride's personal property, and, according to usage, cannot be taken away from her, even by her husband, although he should divorce her. Among Christian Syrians, as well as Moslems, this practice prevails, and it is still quite common for a bride to put upon her person such a dazzling array of precious stones and gold and silver ornaments that the assembled guests are duly impressed with the fact that she is a "woman of worth," in a financial sense at least. The most excitedly dramatic incident is the unveiling of the bride by the bridegroom. This first glimpse of his future life-companion is sometimes a keen disappointment, at others, a pleasant surprise; for neither has seen the other beforehand and there is, therefore, no tender, loving acquaintanceship such as precedes western marriages. Should the husband be pleased with her looks, he announces his satisfaction to the relatives and guests and there is general jubilation and happiness over the result.

Among the poorer Syrians, the women lead hard, laborious lives, that are pitiful to see. Their environment, their ignorance and the placid contentment of their natures makes social elevation almost impossible. It is a land of diverse religions. Christianity is doing much to uplift and cheer the women of Syria but their status has been a low one for many generations. The country is a land of homes, and the people possess many admirable characteristics, which the spread of education and the Gospel are gradually improving. Christian Churches, missions, schools and similar institutions have multiplied of late years and are working harmoniously and effectively for the spiritual redemption and educational uplifting of the Syrian people.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage.

"PALACES OF INDIA."

Text: Amos 3: 10, "Who store up violence and robbery in their palaces."

IN this day when vast sums of money are being given for the redemption of India, I hope to increase the interest in that great country, and at the same time draw for all classes of our people practical lessons, and so I present this fifth sermon in the "'Round-the-world" series. We step into the ancient capital of India, the mere pronunciation of its name sending a thrill through the body, mind and soul of all those who have ever read its stories of splendor, and disaster, and prowess—Delhi.

Before the first historian impressed his first word in clay, or cut his first word on marble, or wrote his first word on papyrus, Delhi stood in India, a contemporary of Babylon and Nineveh. We know that Delhi existed longer before Christ's time than we live after his time. Delhi is built on the ruins of seven cities, which ruins cover forty miles with wrecked temples, broken fortresses, split tombs, tumble-down palaces and the debris of centuries. An archæologist could profitably spend his life here talking with the past through its lips of venerable masonry.

There are a hundred things here you ought to see in this city of Delhi, but three things you must see. The first thing I wanted to see was the Cashmere Gate, for that was the point at which the most wonderful deed of daring which the world has ever seen was done. That was the turning-point of the mutiny of 1857. A lady at Delhi put into my hand an oil-painting about eighteen inches square, a pict- well executed, but chiefly valuable what it represented. It was a scene the time of mutiny; two horses at full harnessed to a carriage in which were persons. She said: "Those persons on the front side are my father and mother. The young lady on the back seat holding in her arms a baby of a year was my older sister and the baby was myself. My mother, who is down with a fever in the next room, painted that years ago. The horses are in full run because we are fleeing for our lives. My mother is driving, for the reason that father, standing up in the front of his carriage, had to defend us with his gun, as you there see. He fought our way out and on for many a mile, shooting down the Sepoys as we went. We had somewhat suspected trouble, and had become suspicious of our servants. A prince had requested a private interview with my father, who was editor of the Delhi "Gazette." The prince proposed to come veiled, so that no one might recognize him, but my mother insisted on being present, and the interview did not take place. A large fish had been sent to our family, and four other families, the present an offering of thanks for the king's recovery from a recent sickness. But we suspected poison, and did not eat the fish. One day all our servants came up and said they must go and see what was the matter. We saw what was intended and knew that if the servants returned they would murder all of us. Things grew worse and worse until this scene of flight shown you in the picture took place. You see, the horses were wild with fright. This was not only because of the discharge of guns, but the horses were struck and pounded by Sepoys, and ropes were tied across the way, and the savage halloo, and the shout of revenge made all the way of our flight a horror."

The books have fully recorded the heroism displayed at Delhi and approximate regions, but make no mention of this family of Wagentreibers whose flight I am mentioning. But the Madras "Atheneum" printed this: "And now! Are not the deeds of the Wagentreibers, though he wore a round hat and she a crinoline, as worthy of imperishable verse as those of the heroic pair whose nuptials graced the court of Charlemagne? A more touching picture than that of the brave man contending with well-nerved arm against the black and threatening fate impending over his wife and child, we have never seen. Here was no strife for the glory of physical prowess, or the spoil of shining arms, but a conquest of the human mind, an assertion of the powers of intellect over the most appalling array of circumstances that could assail a human being. Men have become gray in front of sudden and unexpected peril, and in ancient days so much was courage a matter of heroics and mere instinct that we read in immortal verse of heroes struck with panic and fleeing before the enemy. But the savage Sepoys, with their hoarse war-cry, and swarming like wasps around the Wagentreibers, struck no terror into the brave man's heart. His heroism was not the mere ebullition of despair, but, like that of his wife, calm and wise; standing upright that he might use his arms better."

"THE CASHMERE GATE," DELHI, INDIA.

(Scene of a Famous Deed of Daring, During the Great Mutiny.)

As an incident will sometimes more impress one than a generality of statement, I present the flight of this one family from Delhi merely to illustrate the desperation of the times. The fact was that the Sepoys had taken possession of the city of Delhi, and they were, with all their artillery, fighting back the Europeans who were on the outside, and murdering all the Europeans who were inside. The city of Delhi has a crenulated wall on three sides, a wall five and one-half miles long, and the fourth side of the city is defended by the River Jumna. In addition to these two defences of wall and water, there were 40,000 Sepoys, all armed. Twelve hundred British soldiers were to take that city. Nicholson, the immortal General, commanded them, and you must visit his grave before you leave Delhi. He fell leading his troops. He commanded them even after being mortally wounded. You will read this inscription on his tomb:

"John Nicholson, who led the assault of Delhi, but fell in the hour of victory, mortally wounded, and died 23d September, 1857. Aged 35 years."

With what guns and men General Nicholson could muster he had laid siege to this walled city filled with devils. What fearful odds! Twelve hundred British troops uncovered by any military works, to take a city surrounded by firm and high masonry, on the top of which were 114 guns and defended by 40,000 foaming Sepoys. A larger percentage of troops fell here than in any great battle I happen to know of. The Crimean percentage of the fallen was 17.48, but the percentage of Delhi was 37.9. Yet that city must be taken, and it can only be taken by such courage as had never been recorded in all the annals of bloodshed. Every charge of the British regiments against the walls and gates had been beaten back. The hyenas of Hindooism and Mohammedanism howled over the walls, and the English army could do nothing but bury their own dead. But at this gate I stand and watch an exploit that makes the page of history tremble with agitation. This city has ten gates, but the most famous is the one before which we now stand, and it is called Cashmere Gate. Write the words in red ink, because of the carnage! Write them in letters of light, for the illustrious deeds! Write them in letters of black, for the bereft and the dead. Will the world ever forget that Cashmere Gate? Lieutenants Salkeld and Home, and Sergeants Burgess, Carmichael and Smith offered to take bags of powder to the foot of that gate and set them on fire, blowing open the gate, although they must die in doing it. There they go, just after sunrise, each one carrying a sack containing twenty-four pounds of powder, and doing this under the fire of the enemy. Lieutenant Home was the first to jump into the ditch, which still remains before the gate. As they go, one by one falls under the shot and shell. One of the mortally wounded, as he falls, hands his sack of powder with a box of lucifer matches to another, telling him to fire the sack; when with an explosion that shook the earth for twenty miles around, part of the Cashmere Gate was blown into fragments, and the bodies of some of these heroes were so scattered they were never gathered for funeral, or grave, or monument. The British army rushed in through the broken gate, and although six days of hard fighting were necessary before the city was in complete possession, the crisis was past. The Cashmere Gate open, the capture of Delhi and all it contained of palaces, and mosques, and treasures was possible. Lord Napier, of Magdala, of whom Mr. Gladstone spoke to me so affectionately when I was his guest at Hawarden, England, has lifted a monument near this Cashmere Gate with the names of the men who there fell inscribed thereon. That English Lord, who had seen courage on many a battlefield, visited this Cashmere Gate, and felt that the men who opened it with the loss of their own lives ought to be commemorated, and hence this cenotaph. But, after all, the best monument is the gate itself, with the deep gouges in the brick wall on the left side, made by two bomb-shells, and the wall above, torn by ten bomb-shells, and the wall on the right side, defaced, and scarped, and plowed, and gullied by all styles of long-reaching weaponry. Let the words "Cashmere Gate," as a synonym for patriotism, and fearlessness, and self-sacrifice, go into all history, all art, all literature, all time, all eternity! My friends, that kind of courage sanctified will yet take the whole earth for God. Indeed, the missionaries now at Delhi, toiling amid heathenism, and fever, and cholera, and far away from home and comfort, and staying there until they drop into their graves, are just as brave in taking Delhi for Christ as were Nicholson, and Home, and Carmichael in taking Delhi for Great Britain. Take this for the first sermonic lesson.

Another thing you must see if you go to Delhi, though you leave many things unseen, is the palace of the Moguls. It is an enclosure a thousand yards by five hundred. You enter through a vaulted hall nearly four hundred feet long. Floors of Florentine mosaic, and walls once emeralded, and sapphired, and carbuncled, and diamonded. I said to the guide: "Show us where once stood the Peacock Throne." "Here it was," he responded. All the thrones of the earth put together would not equal that for costliness and brilliance. It had steps of silver, and the seat and arms were of solid gold. It cost about $150,000,000. It stood between vo peacocks, the feathers and plumes of hich were fashioned out of colored stones. bove the throne was a life-size parrot cut ut of one emerald. Above all was a can-py resting on twelve columns of gold, the anopy fringed with pearls. Seated here, ne Emperor on public occasions wore a rown containing among other things the Coh-i-noor diamond, and the entire blaze of ronet cost $10,350,000. This superb and nce almost supernaturally beautiful room as imbedded in the white marble wall let-ers of black marble, which were translated o me from Persian into English as meaning:

If on the earth there be an Eden of bliss,
That place is this, is this, is this, is this.

But the peacocks that stood beside the rone have flown away, taking all the dis-lay with them, and those white marble oors were reddened with slaughter, and hose bath-rooms ran with blood, and that Eden of which the Persian couplet on the valls spake, has had its flowers wither, and ts fruits decay, and I thought while look-ng at the brilliant desolation, and standing mid the vanished glories of that throne oom, that some one had better change a ittle that Persian couplet on the wall and nake it read:

If there be a place where much you miss,
That place is this, is this, is this, is this.

As I came out of the palace into the street of Delhi, I thought to myself: Paradises are not built out of stone; are not cut in sculpture; are not painted on walls; do not spray the cheek with fountains; do not offer thrones or crowns. Paradises are built out of natures uplifted and ennobled, and what architect's compass may not sweep, and sculptor's chisel may not cut, and painter's pencil may not sketch, and gardener's skill may not lay out, the grace of God can achieve, and if the heart be right all is right, and if the heart be wrong, all is wrong. Here endeth the second lesson.

But I will not yet allow you to leave Delhi. The third thing you must see, or never admit that you have been in India, is the mosque called Jumma Musjid. It is the grandest mosque I ever saw except St. Sophia at Constantinople, but it surpasses that in some respects; for St. Sophia was originally a Christian Church, and changed into a mosque, while this of Delhi was originally built for the Moslems.

As I entered, a thousand or more Mohammedans were prostrated in worship. There are times when five thousand may be seen here in the same attitude. Each stone of the floor is three feet long by one and one-half wide, and each worshipper has one of these slabs for himself while kneeling. The erection of this building required five thousand laborers for six years. It is on a plateau of rock; has four towers rising far into the heavens; three great gateways inviting the world to come in and honor the memory of the prophet of many wives; fifteen domes with spires gold-tipped, and six minarets. What a built-up immensity of white marble and red sandstone? We descended the forty marble steps by which we ascended, and took another look at this wonder of the world. As I thought what a brain the architect must have had who first built that mosque in his own imagination, and as I thought what an opulent ruler that must have been who gave the order for such vastness and symmetry, I was reminded of that which perfectly explained all. The architect who planned this was the same man who planned the Taj, namely, Austin deBordeau, and the king who ordered the mosque constructed was the king who ordered the Taj, namely, Shah Jehan. As this Grand Mogul ordered built the most splendid palace for the dead when he built the Taj, at Agra, he here ordered built the most splendid palace of worship for the living at Delhi. See here what sculpture and architecture can accomplish. They link together the centuries. They successfully defy time. Two hundred and eighty years ago Austin de Bordeau and Shah Jehan quit this life, but their work lives and bids fair to stand until the continents crack open, and hemispheres go down, and this planet showers other worlds with its ashes.

I rejoice in all these big buildings, whether dedicated to Mohammed, or Brahma, or Buddha, or Confucius, or Zoroaster: because as St. Sophia at Constantinople was a Christian Church changed into a mosque, and will yet be changed back again, so all the mosques and temples of superstition and sin will yet be turned into churches. When India and Ceylon, and China, and Japan are ransomed, as we all believe they will be, their religious structures will all be converted into Christian asylums, and Christian schools, and Christian libraries, and Christian churches. Built at the expense of superstition and sin, they will yet be dedicated to the Lord Almighty. Here endeth the third lesson.

As that night we took the railroad train from the Delhi station and rolled out through the city now living, over the vaster cities buried under this ancient capital, cities under cities, and our travelling servant had unrolled our bed, which consisted of a rug and two blankets and a pillow; and as we were worn out with the sight-seeing of the day, and were roughly tossed on that uneven Indian railway, I soon fell into a troubled sleep, in which I saw and heard in a confused way the scenes and sounds of the mutiny of 1857, which at Delhi we had been recounting; and now the rattle of the train seemed to turn into the rattle of musketry; and now the light at the top of the car deluded me with the idea of a burning city; and then the loud thump of the railroad brake was in dream mistaken for a booming battery; and the voices at the different stations made me think I heard the loud cheer of the British at the taking of the Cashmere Gate; and as we rolled over bridges the battles before Delhi seemed going on; and as we went through dark tunnels I seemed to see the tomb of Humayun in which the king of Delhi was hidden; and in my dreams I saw Lieutenant Renny, of the artillery, throwing shells which were handed him, their fuses burning; and Campbell, and Reid, and Hope Grant covered with blood; and Nicholson falling while rallying on the wall his wavering troops; and I saw dead regiment fallen across dead regiment, and heard the rataplan of the hoofs of Hodgson's horse, and the dash of the Bengal Artillery, and the storming by the immortal Fourth Column; and the rongher the Indian railway became, and the darker the night grew, the more the scenes that I had been studying at Delhi came on me like an incubus. But the morning began to look through the window of our jolting rail-car, and the sunlight poured in on my pillow, and in my dreams I saw the bright colors of the English flag hoisted over Delhi, where the green banner of the Moslem had waved, and the voices of the wounded and dying seemed to be exchanged for the voices that welcomed soldiers home again. And as the morning light got brighter and brighter, and in my dream I mistook the bells at a station for a church bell hanging in a minaret, where a Mohammedan priest had mumbled his call to prayer, I seemed to hear a chant, whether by human or angelic voices in my dream I could not tell, but it was a chant about "Peace and good will to men." And as the speed of the rail-train slackened the motion of the car became so easy as we rolled along the track that it seemed to me that all the distress, and controversy, and jolting, and wars of the world had ceased; and in my dream I thought we had come to the time when "The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Halt here at what you have never seen before, a depopulated city, the city of Amber, India.

The strange fact is hat a ruler abandoned his palaces at Amber and moved to Jeypore, and all the inhabitants of the city followed. Except here and there a house in Amber occupied by a hermit, the city is as silent a population as Pompeii or Herculaneum: but those cities were emptied by volcanic disaster, while this city of Amber was vacated because Prince Joy Singh was told by a Hindoo priest that no city should be inhabited more than a thousand years, and so the ruler one hundred and seventy years ago moved out himself, and all his people moved with him.

You visit Amber on the back of an elephant. Permission obtained for your visit the day before at Jeypore, an elephant is in waiting for you about six miles out to take you up the steeps to Amber. You pass through the awfully quiet streets, all the feet that trod them in the days of their activity having gone on the long journey, and the voices of business and gaiety that sounded amid these abodes having long ago uttered their last syllable. You pass by a lake covering five hundred acres, where the rajahs used to sail in their pleasure boats, but alligators now have full possession, and you come to the abandoned palace, which is an enchantment. No more picturesque place was ever chosen for the residence of a monarch. The fortress above looks down upon this palace, and the palace looks down upon a lake. This monarchial abode may have had attractions when it was the home of royalty, which have vanished, but antiquity and the silence of many years, and opportunity to tread, where once you would not have been permitted to tread, may be an addition quite equal to the subtraction.

I will not go far into a description of brazen doorway after brazen doorway, and carved room after carved room, and lead you under embellished ceiling after embellished ceiling, and through halls precious-stoned into wider halls precious-stoned. Why tire out your imagination with the particulars, when you may sum up all by saying that on the slopes of that hill of India are pavilions deeply dyed, tasseled and arched; the fire of colored gardens cooled by the snow of white architecture; bath-rooms that refresh before your feet touch their marble; birds in arabesque so natural to life, that while you cannot hear their voices, you imagine you see the flutter of their wings as you are passing; stone-ware translucent; walls pictured with hunting scene, and triumphal procession, and jousting party; rooms that were called "Alcove of Light," and "Court of Honor," and "Hall of Victory;" marble, white and black, like a mixture of morning and night; alabaster, and lacquer-work, and mother-of-pearl; all that architecture, and sculpture, and painting, and horticulture can do when they put their genius together was done here in ages past, and much of their work still stands to absorb and entrance archæologist and sight-seer. But what a solemn and stupendous thing is an abandoned city. While many of the peoples of earth have no roof for their head, here is a whole city of roofs rejected. The sand of the desert was sufficient excuse for the disappearance of Heliopolis, and the waters of the Mediterranean Sea for the engulfment of Tyre, and the lava of Mount Vesuvius for the obliteration of Herculaneum; but for the sake of nothing but a superstitious whim the city of Amber is abandoned forever. Oh, wondrous India! The city of Amber is only one of the marvels which compel the uplifted hand of surprise from the day you enter India until you leave it. Its flora is so flamboyant; its fauna so monstrous and savage; its ruins so suggestive; its idolatry so horrible; its degradation so sickening; its mineralogy so brilliant; its splendors so uplifting; its architecture so old, so grand, so educational, so multipotent, that India will not be fully comprehended until science has made its last experiment, and exploration has ended its last journey, and the library of the world's literature has closed its last door, and Christianity has made its last achievement, and the Clock of Time has struck its last hour.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Hindoo Pariahs.

The Only Hope of the Low-Caste People of India Lies in the Gospel.

BISHOP J. M. THOBURN, in a recent article on missions in India, writes: "The pariahs of Southern India form a part of an immense division of the general community, numbering about 50,000,000 souls, or more than one-sixth of the whole population. These 50,000,000 are divided into many castes and sub-castes, and in recent years the term "depressed classes" has been applied to the whole mass, from the lowest scavengers to the more respectable artisans. The whole 50,000,000 are below the line of social respectability; and, although legally entitled to admission to the public schools, their children are practically excluded from them. Public sentiment would not tolerate their presence. The condition of these people is very hopless, unless they can in some way escape the hard lot which has fallen to them.

Mr. Telang (an educated Brahman) frankly confesses that the hope and the help of these lowly people is in Christianity. With admirable candor, he says: 'The structure of Hindoo society and religion is such that there is no such help for the pariah as the Christian missionary has brought to him.' Those who become Christians improve rapidly and ask no odds of the Brahmans or the Mohammedans. I have seen a son of an extremely low out-caste preparing high-caste youths for university examinations. I have seen hundreds of Christian youths, whose parents had belonged to these classes, in school and college with Hindoo and Mohammedan boys, apparently on terms of good fellowship, and successfully holding their own in the keen competition of the school-room. It ought not to be supposed that all converts in India have come from the lower classes. The Christian community has won a recognized position in the country, and in proportion to its numbers, stands fully abreast of any other community in the country. At the close of the mutiny, a general distrust of missionaries was manifested in some parts of the Empire, but this gradually passed away, and a different feeling now prevails, especially among the common people. The missionary is regarded as the friend of the poor, the representative of public morality, and the promoter of reform. The common people are able to distinguish between spurious Christianity and that which is genuine."

THE GIANTS OF BIBLE TIMES.

Many scientists and investigators have endeavored to settle satisfactorily the question whether man's stature has increased or decreased since the days of the "giants of old." Of the stature of the early heroes of the Pentateuch nothing is said. About the time of Moses, we read that "in these days there were giants on the earth, the sons and daughters of Anak." The spies who went up to view the land of Canaan reported: "There we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants; and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight." Isolated giants are frequently spoken of, such as Og, king of Bashan, Ishbi-benob, who hoped to have slain David, and better known than both, was Goliath, whose stature, we are told, was ten or eleven feet. Nor were the Greeks of a parsimonious disposition when they described the strength and stature of their heroes. Homer grieved over the gradual leveling down of the men of his day. Hesiodus bewailed that his contemporaries had declined in stature compared with the men of the good old times. Herodotus, Pliny, Pausanius and Plutarch have all given expression to a similar idea, the latter complaining that the rising generation resembled new-born babes. Virgil's opinion is well known. In one passage he says: "When the cultivator upturns with his plough the weapons and bones of his ancestors, he is dumbfounded, lost in admiration of their gigantic stature." The results of recent scientific investigation neither tally with the ancient theory of stature degenerating, nor yet with the more modern one of a constant upward tendency. Dr. Rahon, an eminent French scientist, after a very thorough inquiry, and the examination of many ancient skeletons, has reached the conclusion that, while there may have been and no doubt were "giants of old," the people as a whole were of normal stature like those of our own day and generation.

FEEDING THE FIVE THOUSAND.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 13. Mark 6: 30-44. Golden Text Luke 1: 53. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE apostles were pioneers, their ministry made room for that of the seventy, and they in their turn, made room for that of the hundred and twenty on the day of Pentecost. Let us never think when a worker is removed, that his work ceases with him. Like a row of stones in a building, it lies upon the work of his predecessors, and it remains to bear the weight of, and to strengthen future workers. God sees the work in its entirety, and he alone can judge of the value of each worker in his season.

"And they departed into a desert place by ship, privately." A conquest had been gained; these workers, new in the field, had learned to have their work interrupted, just when to human eyes the moment was most unfavorable. Now they must go on to learn another lesson, and be as willing to let their rest be interrupted. "The people saw them departing, and many knew him, and ran afoot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto him." When we take things into our own hands we are always liable to be disappointed. If our confidence is only partial in our God, we may be put out by a disarrangement of our plans. If the disciples had yielded to the suspension of their work at a strain to themselves, and had reluctantly given up the precious opportunities for service that they might have a time alone with the Lord, they would have been doubly impatient that, after procuring rest at such a sacrifice, that rest should be interrupted. It might seem to them to have been a needless sacrifice. But they had to learn from Jesus to take all things, without exception, from a Father's hand. "Jesus, when he came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd." In the Gospel of Luke we read:

"He Welcomed Them."

No thought of whether it suited him, or not, was permitted; nothing could happen without his Father's permission, he took the interruption from his hands, and taught his disciples the double lesson to have either their works or their rest interrupted as their God should will. Far from being a day of rest, it was one of close service. Precious teaching was being given, but it was not what the apostles had looked for; and human nature takes unwillingly the failure of its expectations. Long before the Lord was weary, long before the multitude was weary, the apostles began to find the time long. They came to Jesus and said, "This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed; send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages and buy themselves bread; for they have nothing to eat." Much as Jesus was teaching the multitude, he never for a moment lost sight of his chosen twelve. The whole day had been one of special testing to them, and when he answered and said to them, "Give ye them to eat," it might have seemed to some of them that the strain was too great; he was requiring from them impossibilities, and they say unto him, perhaps with some petulence: "Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?" Human nature would go no farther.

But was the Master making a claim on human nature? Does he ever expect anything from us independently of him? Does he not say: "Apart from me ye can do nothing." Jesus was not at a loss. He put the question to Philip, "Where shall we buy bread, that these may eat?" And this he said to prove him; for he himself knew what he would do." (John 6: 5, 6.) Philip's answer was all on human lines. In all probability Philip had been present when Jesus turned the water into wine, and yet he did not connect the manifestation of his power there with the need of the present moment. "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." Not one of the chosen twelve though they had already been used of God to cast out many devils, and anoint the sick, and heal them (Mark 6: 13), connected the presence and power of Jesus as the solution of the need, and their difficulty. Were they more unbelieving than many of God's children in the present day? How many, in a time of temporal, physical or spiritual need, look in the first place to their own resources, to see how far these will reach out; their money, time, strength, talent, experience, or that which they are able to procure! All they have may be only "five barley loaves and two small fishes" (this was all the disciples could produce), and even were it multiplied to the produce of two hundred pence, it would make a meagre meal for five thousand men besides women and children. There was but one man in the company whose resources were not exhausfed. "Jesus himself

Knew what He Would do."

True Man at all times, he learned from his Father's Word. The manna in the wilderness was more than an incident of ancient history to the Son of man; he read in it the heart and the hand of his heavenly Father. When he had said to his disciples: "Give ye them to eat," he was not mocking their weakness. He was not alone because the Father was with him; the Son of God present with them, how should they not have enough to give to the needy ones around them? There was one thing which the apostles could do. "Make the people sit down." Until this was accomplished nothing could be done. Sitting down, at rest, not attempting to help themselves, they were in a position for Jesus to do something. "They sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties." Then he who made the worlds took the tiny provision into his human hands, and, just when others might have murmured, and while, perhaps, the disciples, who did not know how weak their faith was, were full of disquietude, that one thing after another which was trying and humbling had happened—"he looked up to heaven and blessed." Jesus was not disconcerted. He counted on his Father. We can never be placed in any position which will disconcert us, so long as our eye is really and entirely on our God. One look at ourselves, and faith and courage fail us; but we cannot behold our God and be put to shame. Oh, how often in our life and work for God, we have reviewed our miserable resources, and our hearts have failed us. But these in the hand of Jesus are the divine provision for the emergency. Faith does not only justify God, but gives thanks in the moment of perplexity. With nothing more than five little loaves and his two small fishes in hand, Jesus could give thanks, and he broke the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all.

And they did All Eat, and were filled. A receptive multitude, a believing Son, an Almighty Father! What could not be accomplished! it was simply Almighty supply turned into the channel of real and pressing need. Not one of that vast company went away hungry: everyone was more than satisfied. What a lesson! The disciples had been successful in their ministry, but they needed to learn this lesson of the mountain. Now, if they took heed, their lives and their ministry would be enriched. When they were sufficed, and not till then, he sent the multitude away But all was not finished: the disciples had yet something to do: "Gather up the fragments that remain that nothing be lost." There was enough and to spare, there always is where God is trusted; but nothing to throw away of that which God, in his lovingkindness, gives to us. There is much in every day's experience, much in every exposition of his Word, which patient, persevering disciples may gather, out of that which the generality of people reject and throw away.

All was ordered; the suspension of their ministry, the call for a time of rest, the interruption, the opportunity for faith, the responsibility to trust. All was calculated to empty, and to humble those who were in training for future ministry. God never sacrifices the worker to the work. Just because the apostles showed a right spirit, it was the more worth while to teach them advanced lessons in the school of faith and patience.

ORIENTAL WALLET OR BASKET.

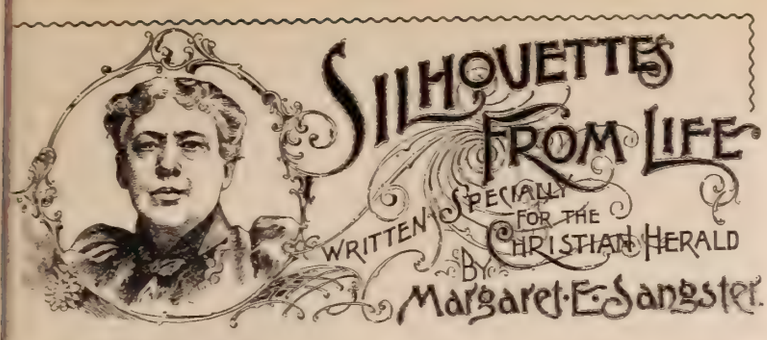
MANY attempts have been made to explain away the miracles, but this of the feeding of the five thousand can have no explanation but one; it was the work of divine power. Everyone knows that five thousand hungry men beside women and children would consume a large quantity of food. They were fed in broad daylight in a solitary place, where no food was accessible and where no ship carrying such a supply of food could have come without being seen. A great preacher calls it a fortress of a miracle; it is impregnable. Probably that was the reason why all the evangelists record it; no other miracle is recorded by them all. It was unpremeditated. Jesus was at Capernaum, whither his disciples hurrying back from their tour, concerned and alarmed by the murder of John the Baptist, went to him. They were full of news. They wanted to tell him of the events of their missionary journeys. Each couple would have a story to relate about their teaching and the attitude of the people. But interruptions were continuous. Not only could they not converse with their Master; there was no time so much as to eat. As usual when Jesus was at his home in Capernaum, the news spread and every family in which there was a cripple or a sick person hurried with the sufferer to the young Teacher to get relief. The strain was too great, and Jesus resolved to go away with his disciples to get privacy and rest. Just across the Lake there was a retired place suited to the purpose. It was a triangular stretch of country having the mountains on one side and the sea on the other. Mark calls it a desert place, but he does not mean a sandy desert, but simply uncultivated. It is called Butaiha. Incidentally he mentions that there was grass there. Jesus and his disciples go there in the ship. But scarcely have they seated themselves when they see crowds of people coming evidently seeking Jesus. They had seen Jesus go and had followed him on land going round the head of the lake, a distance of about four miles from Capernaum. John was dead, and to Jesus they seemed like sheep without a shepherd. Their condition appealed to him, and he resumed his work of teaching and healing. Toward the close of day his attention was called to the fact of their being hungry and he was reminded that they would have a long distance to go to buy food. Jesus proposes that they should be fed there and asks Philip who lived at the neighboring town of Bethsaida, where food could be bought. Philip does not answer that question, but says that it would cost two hundred pence, which would be thirty dollars of our money, to give each one even a morsel. They have only five barley loaves, the poorest, cheapest kind of bread and two fishes. John says the fishes were small. The word he uses indicates a fish much like what we know as sardines, with which the lake abounded and which were dried and sold at a low price. Christ broke the bread and divided the fishes, and in his hands the provision was inexhaustible. All were fed, and the remains filled the baskets or wallets which the disciples had with them.

Sheep not having a Shepherd. Walking through a country district a traveller saw a flock of sheep grazing near a wide brook. Planks were laid across it at intervals of about thirty yards, making rude bridges. Two of these were in the meadow where the sheep were. Suddenly the barking of a dog startled the sheep. They listened a moment and then all started to fly for safety. They made straight for the brook which was on the opposite side of the meadow to that on which the dog was. They halted at the water, evidently afraid to jump. Less than ten yards away was one of the bridges, but not one sheep in the flock seemed to have any notion of its use. At last one jumped, landing safely on the other side. All the rest followed, some falling into the water, some slipping down the opposite bank. Not one went across the bridge, although it was so near. Had the shepherd been there he would have led them to the bridge, but they were helpless without him—sheep not having a shepherd. When we read of the self-tortures, the penances and toils of people in India and other unchristianized countries, in their effort to win salvation, we see how like to sheep unenlightened men are.

Give ye them to eat. The disciples must have been surprised at the command. Where could they get the bread for five thousand men? They had not counted on what Christ could do. Those who count on him now find the help that the disciples did. When George Muller undertook the support of two or three orphan children he had no money of his own to spare, but he believed that God would provide and he did provide. One after another Muller added to the number of his charges and still the money came. He has now over two thousand orphan children in his houses and many thousands have been fed, clothed and educated there, and are now out in the world earning their livelihood. God sent the money to do it and still sends it as it is needed. The two thousand children have never lacked for a meal though Mr. Muller has never once appealed for help to the public. Daily prayer is made to God, and the provision always comes in time. It costs about five thousand dollars a week to clothe and feed the children, but this sum has always been provided. God has influenced people who have heard of the work to send money for its support.

How many loaves have ye? Christ knew that he was going to work a miracle. John mentions in the parallel passage that "He knew what he would do." Why then not make the bread by a creative act out of nothing? Christ never worked in that way. He required something on the part of those that came to him. It is so in spiritual things. Those who come to him for spiritual blessing must bring faith, a consciousness of need, a desire for help or some other feeling with which Christ can work. Chaplains and prison-workers tell the same story. They say there is no hope of reclaiming a criminal until some trait is found in him that they can use. Sometimes a criminal is hard and reckless, and there seems no good in him, but when the chaplain talks to him about his dead mother, or his dead child, he breaks down and is a different man. So the question "How many loaves have ye?" becomes important. It means what is there on which the miracle can be worked?

Baskets full of the fragments. When Jesus could so multiply the loaves why did he direct his disciples to gather up the fragments? Of what value could the pieces of bread be to one who could make tons of bread by a word? So we are apt to think of all divine work. But God does not waste. The fragments, the lives that the world despises as useless are precious in his sight for he can transform them into gems. There is an old story of a great artist in colored glass. He had designed a window for a grand cathedral, and selected for it some very choice material. After he had completed his work an apprentice gathered up the rejected fragments, and from them designed a wheel window in the same cathedral which was pronounced to be more lovely than the work of the great master, although but formed from his leavings. So our God can from the broken and rejected opportunities of our lives, as they appear to us, make some more precious work than we accomplish with the very best we have



A GIRL'S HAND.

SHE was a slight little creature, with eyes like stars for brightness, and blue as a bit of the sky. Her golden hair made a sort of a halo around her peach-blossom face, and her hands and feet were tiny. Altogether, she was a dainty, fragile, wee maiden, twenty years old, and looking seventeen.

But she had a strong spirit, and a resolute will of her own, this airy, fairy Lilian mine, and the superintendent of the Bethel Branch had a level head, and knew what he was about, when he asked her to take the worst class in the school.

"That child?" jeered the secretary. "They'll crush her as if she were an egg shell! Why, Doctor Grimm and Judge Sayerweather have tried that class and given it up in despair! They're a set of roughs, and Miss Lilian will be used up in the session. Better send her to the infant class!"

But the superintendent held his ground.

"It's Lilian Ward or it's nobody," he said firmly. "She and the Lord Jesus together will manage that class! See if they don't."

"Oh! if you're going to be irreverent," answered the secretary, "I have nothing more to urge." And he turned away offended.

"Brother Lawrence," the superintendent laid a gentle hand on the secretary's arm, "why do you take it this way? Is there anything irreverent in coupling the Lord's name with that of one of his servants? Are we not workers together with God here in the Bethel Branch? If not, we would better shut up our shop. It's the Lord Jesus and Lilian, this time, believe me. Why, man, don't you remember the old war-cry that did for the hosts of Midian, 'The sword of the Lord and Gideon?'"

The secretary was appeased, but still doubtful. And the big superintendent, with Lilian at his side, like Una and her lion, walked the length of the room and installed the new teacher in her class.

It was not done in one week, or one month, or three months, and pretty Lilian's blue eyes that could flash and blaze with indignation when there was need of it, were often wet with hot tears as she knelt in her closet at home, but she won her class. Once when the turmoil was at its loudest, a man passing down the chapel aisle to deliver library books, drew the curtain aside and asked if she needed assistance. He never forgot the look she gave him.

"Thank you! We can manage our own affairs," she said quietly. Sometimes she threw the lesson aside and told them stories. After a little, the biggest and roughest lad in the group became her champion and defender, and ordered the kids to behave themselves or he would know the reason why they didn't. Not all at once, but gradually these boys who had gone cold and hungry and slept on hard pillows of paving stones, and "moved on" at the order of the policeman and the prod of his club, some of whom had been in jail, some who had fathers and brothers on the Island, grew interested in the story of One who came to this world in poverty, and fared as the poor fare, and had not where to lay his head. Lilian and the Lord Jesus had conquered them.

When, one bright morning, over a pathway strewn with daisies, Lilian walked to church to be married to the man who had won her heart, the boys formed a procession, and walked after her, and sadly filed in to take places in the rear pews. It was a blow to them, this losing her, and it took away some of their sunshine, but the good seed had been sown, and the teacher who followed Lilian found little difficulty in controlling and influencing the class, several of whom were now members of the church.

Seven years rushed by, as the years do rush by those who are at once busy and happy. Lilian was taking a little journey, and as she sat in the car, the conductor who took her nickel looked at her with keen interest. He was tall and bearded, a fine-looking, gentlemanly fellow. Lilian had noticed his courteous manner, and the care he had taken of an old lady on the train, and of a young woman traveling with three little tots under five years of age.

"I beg pardon, madam," said a low voice at her side, "but are you not Mrs. Matthews, and were you not Miss Lily Ward?"

"Yes, I was Lily Ward," answered the lady, "and I beg pardon, for now that you speak, I see that you were one of my boys at the Bethel—Tom Rodgers, I am sure?"

"Tom Rodgers it is, Mrs. Matthews, and all I am," his voice dropped lower and the look on his face was beautiful to see, "all I am for this world and the next I owe to you. To you and the Lord Jesus," he answered solemnly.

Then he went on to tell her rapidly—he, a boy who had been a waif and stray of the streets, of this work on the line, his promotion, his little home with a wife and a baby, and his place in the Y. M. C. A. and the Christian Endeavor. It was told in a few quick flying minutes, but Lilian's very soul was uplifted with joy and praise. Christ had given her some sheaves. She closed her eyes in a prayer of thankfulness, and the express train went whirling and thundering on.

JAPANESE TREE WORSHIP.

In many parts of the world trees have at different times, been worshipped by the superstitious and ignorant. To the mind of the educated West, the groves of the cedars of Lebanon would appeal more strongly than the groves of the Sierra Nevada; the bulk of the one could not outweigh the associations of the other. But to the primitive notions of Eastern peoples, the giant tree makes a direct appeal, uot only for respect, but for worship. Whatever departs from the ordinary course of nature strikes them as the immediate work of God, and one which necessarily preserves something of the divine. Such, for example, is the holy pine of Japan, with its double stem, pictures of which are presented to every bride and bridegroom on the marriage-day; and this claim to worship is shared potentially in the East by every great tree that overtops its fellows.

Raising the Fallen.

The Christ-like Work Being Done at the Bethesda Mission in the Reclamation of the Friendless and Fallen.

ONE of the most conspicuous signs of the effort this generation has witnessed to bring into greater prominence the teaching and example of Christ himself as the model of Christian life, is the increased interest taken in the reclamation of the fallen. Especially is this so in the case of those women who have left the path of virture. The church has at last realized that hatred for the sin should be combined with pity for the sinner. The first steps in the attempt to rescue these women showed that it was Christ-like work, for it was found that large numbers of them were continuing in sin because they felt that society regarded them as outcasts, and took no concern for their welfare. As soon as they perceived that Christian people stood ready to help them to retrieve the past and live a clean life, many dropped their defiant attitude, confessed that they loathed the life they were leading, and desired nothing so much as reformation. Thus the reward came to the church for following its Master's example in preaching salvation to the lost.

Our readers have for some time past been doing good service in this field. Mainly through their gifts a few kind Christian ladies in Brooklyn, N. Y., have been enabled to keep open a home in that city where any girl who desired to leave a life of sin could go and receive Christian counsel and decent food and clothing, with a shelter for her weary body. This was absolutely necessary as the first step in a systematic attempt at reclamation. The city missionary or the volunteer Christian worker who spoke a word of kindness and warning to one of these lost ones would receive in reply to any appeal to leave the life of sin, the question, "Where can I go? How could I live?" And sometimes sadly, sometimes scornfully the girl would say, "No one would employ such as I; no one would receive me into their home." That was true, and there were good reasons for it. Sin is contaminating and the sinner cannot complain if society shrinks from the danger of contamination. But the difficulty remained and its solution was found in establishing homes for the reception of these women where Christian influences would surround them, and the way be paved for their restoration to decent society. Such a home is the Bethesda Mission, which our readers have been helping to support.

If is at 208 Union street—a quiet and respectable section of the city, where there is nothing to remind the inmates of their past life and everything to encourage them to return to the paths of virtue. It is in charge of the Misses Brace, two ladies of eminent Christian character whose gentleness, patience and kindness win the confidence of the girls. They have devoted their lives to this work without remuneration, glad if they can have the opportunity of pointing lost souls to the Saviour. Stronger faith than these ladies have it would be difficult to find. They believe that Christ saves to the uttermost, and that none, however low and degraded they may be, are beyond the reach of his love and power. With this faith in their hearts they urge the fallen to trust him not only for the salvation of their souls, but for the strength to keep them from falling back into sin. At the present time there are twelve girls under their care, all of whom show signs of genuine reformation. Many others have been in the home in the past few months during which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have been sending money for its support. Some have been restored to their families, who have gladly welcomed the repentant wanderer; others, after a period of probation, have become domestic servants or in some other way have been helped to earn a decent livelihood. Others, as was inevitable, have accepted the shelter of the home in an hour of depression, or extreme need, but without the true repentance or conviction of sin which comes before permanent reclamation, and these have returned to their evil ways, to the sorrow of the good ladies who worked and prayed for their conversion. But these have been a comparatively small proportion of the entire number received, and under the system now being tentatively adopted the number will be still smaller.

It has been thought that the Bethesda might do a very much needed and useful work if it were made in some degree a training school by extending its educational facilities. There has always been a difficulty in finding work for girls, who had no knowledge of any occupation by which they could support themselves. Some of the girls, who are anxious to reform, do not know anything even of common household duties; others are constitutionally unfitted for such duties and would find them irksome, even if they were taught. Some of these latter show considerable skill with the needle, and with very little instruction might become milliners or dressmakers. Others, again, have been well educated without any special training. These might become clerks and typewriters. These facts, learned by experience, have suggested the thought that girls received into the temporary shelters in New York and Brooklyn, who convince the matrons in charge of them that their desire for reform is genuine and who give evidence of that spiritual change on which alone hopes of permanent reformation can be based, might be sent to the Bethesda for just the technical training that they need to support themselves. The plan has been mentioned to several of the managers of the shelters and has been approved. With their co-operation, if it can be secured, the Bethesda might become a very "door of hope," to repentant sinners and remove the greatest obstacle to reclamation.

Already a beginning has been made in this work. One of the inmates proved to be an experienced dressmaker and she is giving instruction in the art. A friend of the institution is also teaching other kinds of needlework. In addition a laundry is in operation, and the inmates are employed in one way or other, and are thus able to contribute a little toward their own support, while acquiring the knowledge that may eventually make them independent.

The Bethesda has exceptional facilities for such work. Its committee of management, at the head of which is Miss L. J. Eginton, is composed of ladies who take a deep, personal interest in the home and one of them—Miss Halvorsen, was its originator and founder. They have all aided it in various ways and are anxious to extend its sphere of usefulness. The building is well-adapted for the purpose. It is capable of accommodating over thirty inmates. Gladly would the committee and the matrons see it filled from attic to basement, and it would be so filled if the applicants could be admitted. Unhappily the funds have never been sufficient to furnish the home. There is room for about twenty more cots than there now are, but the money to buy the cots has never been at command. From sixty to seventy dollars are needed to furnish the vacant rooms and make the home all that it might be. It is grievous to tell girls who come to the home, as they do often, with the desire to turn from their wickedness and live, that they cannot be received, but while every cot is occupied, and there is no place for them to sleep but the bare boards of the floors of the vacant rooms, they cannot be admitted. The matrons, however, are not discouraged. They believe that in his own good time God will send the funds to complete the furnishing, and the work will grow yet more useful.

A NEW YEAR'S THOUGHT.

WHAT sublime rest in the thought that the roll of the centuries does not age the Omnipotent! In the nineteenth century, as in the first, in the dying groan of the world to be, as he was in the opening chant of creation, master of all worlds and all centuries, from everlasting to everlasting, God the first, God the last, and this God our Father, this God our Friend, this God our shelter, this God our eternal home. If I had an idea that any man, or any party of men, had the control of this world, I would not sleep nights for trepidation. Jehovah governs, so I have not a particle of fear. He will work out of darkest gloom radiant consummations. Trust him for all. Eternity is his lifetime. The noonday sun is only a spark struck from his anvil. The ocean is a drop from the overflowing cup of his joy. All the ages of time are only a small section of his forever. Why, then, should you fret about this, and worry about that, and wonder about the other thing? The Lord reigneth, let the earth be glad. There come times in our life when we seem hedged in and we do not know which way to turn. Patiently wait for the way to clear. No crisis of events can ever surprise the Lord. In his hand confide health, family, business, body, and soul this New Year.

[illegible] Him not,
[illegible] tell.
[illegible] the throne,
He ruleth all things well.

THE SIN OF AVARICE.

THE best place to see avarice is not where its victim dies under embroidered canopy in a palace, but where the certificates of large deposits are ripped out of the pads of an old dress. The same principle that controlled a half-starved and ragged miser is holding in its grip ten thousand men who are denying themselves all ease and comfort that they may pile up great fortunes. It matters not whether the goal aimed at is twenty thousand or twenty million dollars; whether the articles trafficked in are refuse meat or percentages in stock exchange, it is all the same. What a debasing passion that is which makes money-getting paramount. If you are living a dog's life, snatching what you can snatch, denying yourself all personal and domestic and social comforts, you may leave something for your heirs to quarrel about when you are dead. The trouble with avarice is that it is respectable. We fling people out of church and social life for drunkenness and impurity; but a man may have surrendered body, mind, and soul to miserliness and yet keep his position. What church ever expelled a member for money clutching? And yet before God and the angels I think this vice is as disgusting as the two vices I have just now mentioned. There are tens of thousands of men whose bodies, minds, and souls are consuming with this infernal passion for gain.

A London stock jobber was worth a hundred thousand pounds. He was found dying in a garret. He had been eating the most disgusting food because it was cheap. He told the overseers of the poor that he was going to leave them in his will one thousand pounds, but asked them if in consideration of prompt payment they would not allow him a discount! When they assented, he, in great glee, gave them a check for nine hundred and fifty pounds! You and I have seen the same thing on a smaller scale in this country. It is well once in a while for the world to look on such a case, and see what avarice is when stark and unadorned and loathsome. Do not mistake me. The more money a man has the better, if he gets it honestly and uses it lawfully. The whole teaching of the Bible has a tendency to create those kinds of habit and that kind of mental acumen which leads on to riches. The man who talks against wealth as though it were a bad thing, is either a knave or a fool—not meaning what he says, or ignorant of the glorious uses to which money can be applied. But the person who builds the soul's happiness on earthly accumulation is a wretched being, whether the life be spent in a garret or a mansion. If you are not happy now with the smaller possessions, you will never be happy with the larger possessions. If with decent and comely apparel you are not grateful to God, you would be ungrateful if you had a prince's wardrobe crowded until the hinges burst. How shall I break the infatuation of those of you who are neglecting the present sources of satisfaction, hoping that there is to be something in the future for them of a worldly nature that will satisfy their soul?

DEAD BOOKS.

WHETHER it be Asiatic cholera or the trichinæ that has got among books we know not, but most certain it is they are dying a hundred a day. The second-hand book-stores are the morgues where thousands of them are laid out. Many of them died after doing their work and their end was peace. But many of them from the start were afflicted with a marasmus that never allowed them to take one healthy breath. The mortality of novels is something fearful. Three-fourths of them never paid the expenses of their publication. The entire enterprise was a dead loss.

Most men need to publish one book in order to find what an expensive and unsatisfactory business it is in most cases. We had a friend who had given birth to a religious poem. He thought it would rival "Paradise Lost," and shake the nations. He kept the secret under lock and key for a long while, showing it only to a few especial friends, and that under promise of secrecy. He grew thin in calculating at what time the world could best endure the exhilaration of its publication. At last the manuscript was in type, and the proof was read, and the book put upon the market. He banqueted his friends on publication day, in anticipation of a large fortune. He figured up how many would be sold. First, he calculated on disposing of twenty thousand; but as he reviewed the importance of the work and the fascination of the style, he put up the figures to fifty thousand. Afterward, bethinking himself of the fact that it is impossible to keep a rare thing on this side of the Atlantic, and the certainty of its world-wide distribution, he concluded it reasonable to expect the circulation of one hundred thousand. The fact was, that of the first edition of five hundred copies one hundred and fifty were sold, and the rest were given away. Its rivalry didn't hurt John Milton's reputation a bit.

We once had a cross old relative who believed in war because he thought the best way to reform the human race was to keep killing it off. While we reject that theory, we really believe that this epidemic among books is fortunate. If one-half of the books which have been printed in the last thirty years had continued to live, our libraries and tables and book-stands would have been so crowded that the world would have had no room to turn around. If all the snow that has ever fallen had continued lying on the ground, we should have had banks of it reaching well on up toward the moon, but fortunately the crystals melt; and the only reason that our way is not entirely blocked by snowstorms of literature is because through the paper-mills the material soaks away. Long life to all good books, and honorable sepulture to those that die early.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. J. Lemmert, New Haven, Ct. Some time ago I read a notice in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of a little book: "The Lord's Coming," by Mrs. M. Baxter. How can I secure a copy and what is the price?

We have still a few copies left of the third edition. You can procure one by sending fifteen cents to this office.

Gertrude Bayne, Luton, Ia. What was the language used by Adam and Eve?

All endeavors to identify the language of our first parents have proved futile. Speech, or the power of lingually expressing the thoughts or impressions of the mind seems to have been coeval with the human creation, and it is probable that the first efforts in this direction were confined to the expression of simple physical wants. The growth of a vocabulary must have been a slow process.

Fred'k L. Manton, Harrisburg, Pa. We are preparing a package of clothing and supplies for the suffering Nebraska farmers. Is there any one district more needy than the rest, to which it should be sent? We will, of course, prepay the expressage, as you suggested.

Where all are so distressed, it is difficult to discriminate. Make your choice from among the cases mentioned in the letters printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Such kindly, thoughtful charity will bring a blessing to you and yours.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chapman, Sacramento, Cal., writes: "In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for Oct. 17, 1894, page 662, I find an article on 'Microbes and Plagues,' referring to yellow fever. Two ladies, who passed through a season of it in New Orleans, described a remedy prescribed for others by residents, who had passed through it unharmed. The remedy used was the leaves and blossoms of the orange tree, which grows in such abundance there, from which a tea was made and drank constantly. I am informed that it is a sure preventative for yellow fever. I am told that some French people use orange tea as a tonic."

R. J. Parks, Waterloo, Ia. Who is the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel, mentioned in Gen. 49: 24?

The passage is understood in many different ways by various commentators. It is extremely enigmatical. The most probable theory is that it is a vague reference to the Messiah. If so, then the word translated "thence" does not refer to Joseph, but to God. The passage in that case would be as if read, "The mighty God of Jacob, from whom shall come the Shepherd, the stone."

A. M. Douthett, Brownsdale, Pa. In enumerating the difference between Baptists and Methodists, you omit their different views of election and predestination; are those not radically different?

Not necessarily. As a matter of fact, Baptists are usually Calvinists, but of late years the Calvinistic doctrines have not been so prominent in Baptist preaching as they used to be. There are many Baptist pulpits in which a preacher would be acceptable, even if he had abandoned Calvinism. But he would be decidedly out of place if he advocated baptism by sprinkling, or if he advocated church government through a conference. The two points we mentioned are the distinctive features of difference.

Constant Reader, Palmyra, Wis. If a man acts according to the dictates of his conscience, must he not be right? How is it that men equally conscientious reach opposite conclusions?

A man may act according to the dictates of his conscience and yet do wrong. Paul was perfectly conscientious when he persecuted the church. The conscience needs to be informed, and it needs to be freed from the prejudices which come from constitution or from education. It acts as a judge. We have no confidence in a judge in our law courts unless he has a knowledge of law and is unbiased. As a man prays for wisdom, and earnestly strives to know and do what is right, the conscience becomes more reliable, but there are non-essential matters in which men, through education and environment, will always be opposed to each other, and yet be conscientious.

Lemuel Thompson, Princeton, N. J. What is the attitude of modern science toward the Biblical story of the Flood?

Substantially corroborative. Raymond de Girard, the eminent Swiss geologist and Suess, the German scientist, affirm that the Noachian deluge was due to a gigantic series of seismic phenomena. In the Chaldean story of the Flood, which has been taken from the cuneiform inscription, the story of Genesis is corroborated with much detail. The tablets tell of the dark clouds, the thunders, the whirlwinds; the floods that came from earth and sky; the overflowing canals, and the widespread inundation. Some modern scientists assume that the deluge was limited to the Chaldeo-Mesopotamian territory, but there is no general agreement as to its extent.

Maria G. Johnston, Higley, Fla. I am anxious to have the larger Bible, I have the small one as a Premium, and also "From Manger to Throne." If I want the Gospel Hymn Book and large printed Bible (Premium No. B-3), what amount sha l I send?

Send $2.00 extra for the larger Bible and $1.00 for the Gospel Hymns—$3 in all.

J. H. Faucett, Buffalo Hart, Ill. 1. Is the commandment in Matt. 10: 8 Heal the sick, &c., to be obeyed now? 2. Has an evangelist a right to baptize, if he has never been ordained? 3. If a man who has been converted and baptized, and has afterward been a backslider, is reclaimed, ought he to be baptized again?

1. It was a commandment to the Apostles who needed miraculous powers which Jesus gave them as credentials, so that the people might give heed to their teaching, perceiving that they had authority from God. If God gave such powers in these days, those who received them would be under the solemn duty of exercising them. 2. It depends on the discipline of the church to which he belongs. There is no virtue in ordination. It is simply a protection to the people, so that improper persons may not assume to speak in the name of the church and mislead others. If a man is fit to preach, he is fit to baptize. No one ever questioned Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's right to baptize; yet he was never ordained. 3. It will do no harm if he wishes to be baptized again; but there is no need for it. If he has really repented and has gone to Christ for forgiveness, that is all that is necessary.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE RED CROSS IN THE WAR.

IT is gratifying to learn that in adopting the military system of Western civilization, Japan has not overlooked the merciful arrangements included in the system for the alleviation of suffering. Her enemy has not the least notion of surgery. A wounded man in the Chinese army has little chance of recovery if his wound is too severe to heal unassisted. China has such an overflowing population that life seems to be held very cheaply there and the trouble of setting a broken limb, or saving a patient's life by an amputation appears to be regarded as not worth taking. To let the wounded man die and supply his place with a new recruit is a simple arrangement which commends itself to the Chinese official mind. But the Japanese are a different people. They have adopted the Red Cross idea and have thus given proof of their advance in civilization. The picture on this page shows the Japanese surgeons at work after a battle. It was taken from a sketch made on the spot by Mr. Frederic Villiers, the artist of "Black and White." On one side an orderly is bending over a man with a wounded leg, cleansing the gash with the help of an irrigator; another, with skill that would do credit to a dresser in a European hospital, is bandaging the head of a wounded foe. A Chinaman in like circumstances would have settled the question by cutting it off. It is much to be wished that the merciful kindness thus shown to wounded enemies were the invariable characteristics of the Japanese forces. That it is not so, is evident from a letter sent to a New York journal by Mr. Creelman, its correspondent at the seat of war. He says that after the capture of Port Arthur, there was a massacre by the Japanese of unoffending Chinese citizens, which continued for four days. Thousands of unarmed men, women and children were ruthlessly slaughtered in cold blood and no quarter was given on account of age or sex. The cause was the discovery by the Japanese, when they entered the city, of a number of corpses of their comrades which were horribly mutilated. The Japanese, believing that the Chinese had tortured their comrades to death, were exasperated and took vengeance on the inoffensive inhabitants, who certainly were not responsible for the outrage. The report has aroused great indignation against the Japanese, but some allowance must be made for the provocation, and also for the very short interval which separates the Japanese of to-day from a time of semi-barbarism, in which magnanimity and mercy had no place. It is from Christianity, not from human nature or civilization, that men learn to love their enemies, and do good to them that despitefully use them. (Matt. 5: 44.)

THE JAPANESE RED CROSS CORPS ATTENDING TO CHINESE WOUNDED PRISONERS.

Alive, but Legally Dead.

A peculiar argument was made before a New Jersey judge on December 19. The lawyer who made it, represented a client who was at the time lying under the sentence of death at Camden, N. J. He was convicted in May last and sentenced to be hanged on December 13. The Governor, however, on December 4, in compliance with a petition sent to him, gave the prisoner a reprieve of thirty days to allow him time to petition the Board of Pardons. This the prisoner did, but the Board rejected the petition. It was supposed that the man would be executed, as a matter of course, on January 3, when the reprieve of thirty days would expire. But his lawyer has raised the question of the Governor's right to have him hanged then. He contends that under the New Jersey laws the Governor has no right to interpose to prevent the execution of a sentence unless he does so within ninety days of the conviction of the prisoner. The Governor's reprieve was therefore illegal and the original sentence is consequently the only legal record in the case. As the date fixed in that sentence is past, the prisoner must be regarded as legally dead, and the law has no further control over him. Having made the argument, the counsel applied for the release of his client. Doubtless the legal authorities will brush away this ingenious sophistry and the man will pay the penalty of his crime. But as the Christian rejoices to know, there are circumstances in which a man may be legally dead while yet alive. He is "dead to the law by the body of Christ." (Rom. 7: 4.)

An effort has been made to solve the mystery of a double murder at Jamestown, N. Y., by the aid of science. On Dec. 15 two women who were alone in one of the houses of the town were murdered in broad daylight. They were mother and daughter, and were apparently sitting together when attacked by some miscreant who killed them both, and then searched the house for plunder. The weapon used was an axe, but that could not be found after the murder. There was no clue of any kind, save a few foot-marks in the mud at the back of the house. A local scientist suggested that the eyes of the murdered women should be examined through a microscope to ascertain if the retina still bore the image on which the women last looked in life. The suggestion was adopted, and on Dec. 20 the Coroner and a number of witnesses were present while an examination was made. The eyes of the daughter revealed nothing, but in the eyes of the mother the image of a man was distinctly outlined. The microscope, which magnified four hundred times, showed the man in a stooping attitude with one foot lifted as if stealthily advancing toward his victim. The face was hidden, but the lower part of the figure was quite clear. He was a large man wearing a long overcoat reaching below the knees, and the wrinkles in his trousers showed plainly. All the witnesses examined the picture on the retina and verified the descriptive statement that was drawn up. Evidently the mother had caught a glimpse of the man as he crawled toward her, and had afterward seen nothing more on earth. Many have been disposed to doubt whether the retina does retain after death the image last mirrored there, but this instance appears to be well authenticated. It may yet be discovered that in some way by some subtle process unknown to us now, not only what we see but what we say or do leaves an indelible impression upon ourselves or others which may become a record of our lives. (Mark 4: 22.)

For Sunken Treasure.

Another effort is to be made to recover the treasure which for thirty years has been lying in the hold of the steamer "Pewabic" at the bottom of Lake Huron. A diver from Harrisburg, Pa., is said to have made an effort to go down and examine the sunken steamer, and raise it, if the syndicate having control of the business, will give him one half the treasure, if he succeeds, and will insure his life for twenty-five thousand dollars, so that his family may be provided for if he dies. The "Pewabic" is said to have had on board, when she was sunk in the collision with the "Meteor," $300,000 in gold coin and five hundred tons of the finest copper in the world." The treasure, therefore, has excited the eager desires of many adventurous men. But it lies in twenty-five fathoms of water and there is great risk in the quest. Already four lives have been sacrificed in trying to secure it. Five years ago a diver from Toledo, O., went down, and was drawn up dead. Two years afterward another diver, tempted by the reward offered, went down on two occasions, but on the second, he too lost his life. His armor was stove in, as if by some great force. Since then two other divers have gone down, neither of whom survived the effort. Now, it appears that a fifth proposes to put his life in peril. The fact of his stipulating for an insurance on his life shows that he is aware of the dangerous nature of his undertaking. Many people who would be very glad to get so large a sum of money, will be disposed to think the man foolish in incurring so awful a risk to gain it. Yet how many to gain wealth lightly incur an infinitely more appalling risk by putting in peril their immortal souls! (Matt. 16: 26.)

A Heroic Engineer.

A deed of heroism worthy of world-wide fame was performed at West Pittston, Pa., a few days ago. The hero was Thomas Lloyd, the engineer of the Stevens colliery. He was busy cleaning his engine when he noticed a smell of smoke. Looking around, he saw that a heap of oily waste had caught fire and the flames were crawling rapidly up the side of the engine house. He ran out and filling a pail with water threw it on the fire. But the whole shed was reeking with oil and the water had no effect on the flames. He was alone in the place fighting desperately with the devouring element. There was no hope of saving the building and the thought of the forty men down in the mine rushed upon his mind with a great horror. The engine would soon be disabled and then there would be no way of raising the men from the mine. The fans would stop, leaving them to perish from the deadly gases. If they were to be saved, not a moment must be lost. The engine sounded the warning whistle. It rang through the mine eight hundred feet below and the men quitted their work and ran to the foot of the shaft. The engineer waited above for the signal to hoist. At last the signal was given. Eagerly he grasped the lever and watched the cable wind around the drum. Then came the signal to descend. The men were not all up. A second time the cage was drawn up and again the signal to descend was given. Still the men were not all up. The engineer grasped the lever, the cage descended and came up with the last of the men. Then the heroic man staggered blindly out through the flames and fell fainting on the ground. His injuries are severe, but the doctors think that he will recover. It was a noble deed and although the men whose lives were saved may be strangers to us, we honor the engineer and applaud him for his act. Yet how many who so honor him hear with indifference, that to secure their own salvation from eternal death, Christ voluntarily laid down his own life. (1 Peter 2: 24.)

The Problem of the Suffrage is being Tested in Belgium in a novel way. Every man over twenty-five, if he is not a pauper, has one vote. If he is over thirty-five, married, a widower, or a father, and pays the yearly inhabited house tax, he has two votes. A university degree gives him a third vote.

A Men's Bible School Especially for Those without any regular church home or employment, is held every Sunday afternoon in the Seventh Street Methodist Episcopal Church, near Cooper Institute, New York. The school is taught by the pastor, Rev. Dr. Saunders, and meets at 2.30 p. m. Dr. Saunders takes a personal interest in the welfare of the people. He will be glad to have the help of any one who is willing to help another find work and live a good life. He will also be glad if employers desiring workingmen of almost any description will communicate with him at 22 Seventh street, and reliable men will be recommended.

The Moody Bible Institute in Chicago to the support of which our readers have been contributing, has made up its record to the end of the year. It has kept track of the students who have passed through its course of study and reports that of those who formerly attended the Institute, one hundred and fifty-three are Pastors or Pastor's Assistants in sixteen denominations, sixty-nine are Home Missionaries; sixty-seven are Foreign Missionaries; twenty are Secretaries in Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations; twenty are employed by Sunday School Boards; ninety are Evangelists; twenty-five are Superintendents of City Missions; fifteen are Teachers in Educational Institutions, and one hundred and forty are pursuing their studies in Theological Seminaries and Medical Schools for Home and Foreign Work. Thus there are, with those now at the Institute, nine hundred and two, men and women from the Institute, at work the year round.

"The Green Hill Far Away."

Our Traveler Visits the Traditional Site of the Crucifixion—"Jeremiah's Grotto"—The Solitary Tomb on Calvary and the Riven Rock.

IT is Sunday morning, and without communicating our intention to any one except our dragoman, we have left the hotel directly after breakfast, accompanied by him, passed out of the city through the Jaffa Gate, and skirting the walls as far as the Damascus Gate, diverged there from the highway to climb this gentle eminence. The top and one side are studded with many flat and a few upright tomb-stones. For uncounted generations the Moslems have buried their dead here, and thus protected it from the encroachment of buildings for the use of the living. Across the road rises the north wall of Jerusalem, founded upon and built into the solid rock. The ancient capital of Israel was "a city that had foundations." In the native granite upbearing the massive masonry is a rude door, closed to-day and locked, leading into Solomon's Quarries. We explored them yesterday, marvelling to see "what manner of stones" were left there by workmen who hewed out and squared the material for the temple "so that there was neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building." Big blocks, still as white as chalk because never exposed to air and light, bear the marks of chisel and wedge. When the quarry was first opened many years ago, bones of men, and also of animals used for food, and fragments of pottery, were found in out-of-the-way corners. These last were probably left there by workmen, while the human remains may have been those of fugitives from the law, or from persecution, forced to hide in forgotten dens.

Diagonally opposite the quarry yawns a natural cave known familiarly as "the Grotto of Jeremiah," from a tradition that the prophet lived there while writing his Lamentations. I name it now because it and another wide mouth in the upright rock form the eyes in the "skull," which is considered by some to assist in the identification of this hill with Golgotha. By the help of imagination anybody can make out the eyes, the line of the nose and the mouth. Some think it marvellous, and attach great importance to the fantastic likeness. Others find in the round top of the hill warrant for calling it "the place of a skull." Thoughtful archæologists set aside these features of the spot, whether natural or artificial, as unnecessary in proving that here was enacted the most momentous scene in the history of the world and of the universe. Since our arrival in Jerusalem, we have studied carefully the evidence in favor of what is now the received hypothesis of the most learned and devout Bible scholars of the age, with regard to the place of the Crucifixion. As briefly as is consistent with comprehensiveness, I will rehearse some of the reasons we have for believing this "green hill" to be the True Calvary.

I have already cited several arguments against the once-popular belief that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre covers the place where the Cross was set up, as well as "that where the Lord lay" during the three days separating his death from his resurrection. It is needless to repeat them here further than to say that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is not and has never been outside of the gate of Jerusalem, and that our Lord was led forth to the "place of the skull," and "suffered without the gate" is directly affirmed by the writers of the Bible. Scripture students will not be required to be reminded of the important significance of this circumstance in connection with Christ, our sacrifice.

In looking, then, for a hill resembling a skull in shape, without the gate, in a public place where many passing by would witness the Crucifixion, bearing in mind also that the place of public execution among the Romans remained the same from one age to another—(as witness the scene of Paul's death at Tre Fontane near Rome, well known as the ancient Tyburn of that city) and seeking to find records of other executions as having occurred in the same vicinity; reading that the new sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea was near the place where he was crucified, and hence in consecrated ground already used as a Jewish burying-ground—it would be strange indeed had intelligent explorers failed to see how faithfully all these requisites are met by the hill on which we now sit.

Behind us, as we face the city and look directly into the Temple enclosure, lies what was known four hundred years after Christ as the "Place of Stoning," and as the scene of Stephen's death. It bears the name still in Jewish tradition and there, according to Jewish chroniclers, criminals were hung up by the hands after death until the sun went down. A church in memory of St. Stephen was raised upon the "Place of Stoning" by St. Eudocia in the fifth century, the ruins of which have lately been excavated down to the exquisite mosaic pavement. In turning to the account of the death of Stephen, we note that the marginal reference against the words, "they cast him out of the city," is Heb. 13:12: "Wherefore, Jesus, also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate." The proximity of the two places is, is to say the least, a singular coincidence.

A great Hebrew cemetery lay all about the base, and upon the slope of the line of hills of which Calvary is one, for centuries before our Lord's birth. Of this I shall speak more at length by-and-by. If Joseph had wished to be gathered to his fathers at his death, he would naturally have made hereabouts his new tomb.

At "Herod's Gate," began in the time of our Lord the great military road leading fromtJerusalem to Cæsarea Philippi, along which Paul was hurried at night by his escort of four hundred and seventy Roman soldiers, he riding in their midst upon the beast provided for him to bring him safe to Felix, the governor. This road, recently discovered, winds directly about the foot of this hill, and the forks of the great highway lead off to Damascus and other large towns. At the great feast of the Passover, it would have been thronged with passers-by and lent itself fully to the custom of the Romans of making their places of execution as public as possible by establishing them near the busiest thoroughfares.

I cannot resist the temptation to quote at this point from the eloquent comment of Dr. Cunningham Geikie upon his able summing-up of proofs as to the identity of the "New Calvary" with the old: "Here, then, apparently on this bare, rounded knoll, the Saviour of the world appears to have passed away with that great cry which has been held to betoken cardiac rupture, for it would seem that he literally died of a broken heart. Before him lay outspread the guilty city which had clamored for his blood; beyond it, the pale slopes of Olivet from which he was shortly to ascend in triumph to the right hand of the Majesty on High; and in the distance, but clear and seemingly near, the pinkish-yellow mountain of Moab, lighting up, it may be, the fading eyes of the Innocent One with the remembrance that his death would one day bring back lost mankind to the kingdom of God."

I read it aloud, and then, more slowly and tenderly, the story of the Crucifixion given by each of the four Evangelists.

The day is very still, the place is deserted but for ourselves, seated upon a flat tomb-stone, and David who stands within hearing of the familiar, always-thrilling words. About our feet fragile crocuses pierce the earth, clustering closely upon the southern side of the grave-stones. Hyssop grows freely in the pale green turf, and wild lilies shoot rank leaves above the lower herbage. Masses of clouds, white and gray, roll slowly apart, glints of sunshine gleam fitfully upon the lower cliff at our right, where is another and much smaller cave than the Grotto of Jeremiah—a sepulchre hewn in the rock, and overlooking a garden. A very ancient well attests the age of the enclosed space, and olive and fig-trees grow in it.

We let ourselves down to the lower level, and are in front of what Gordon Cummings, Selah Merrill, Lew Wallace and many, many other godly and learned men believe to be the long-hidden tomb of the Christ.

We have visited the vaults excavated with the ruined church built by the pious Eudocia, and seen with strange emotion the grooves in which moved the "rolling stones" used in our Lord's time for closing the mouth of the principal tomb containing several sarcophagi, or niches, in which bodies were laid. When uncovered, these were full of bones, great heaps of which are still to be seen in holes beneath the niches. A road divides this cemetery from Calvary, and explorers have not been permitted to dig beneath the highway for other graves that no doubt reach all the way to the solitary tomb in the side of Calvary. A board door has been fitted into the opening once filled by the rolling stone, and a square window cut in the same side of the rock allows any one to look in. The door is kept locked, and the key, during Dr. Merrill's term of office, was kept at the American Consulate. A single empty sarcophagus fills the far end of the small chamber. There is no inscription record; no frippery of altar, candle, lace and artificial flowers detracts from the solemn simplicity of the shrine. Upon the brink of the natural cliff is a great rock, oddly riven from top to bottom, as by the shock of an earthquake, each severed projection corresponding to a depression or gap upon the other side of the fissure. David points out these peculiarities diffidently:

"Of course nobody can say positively that it is so, and we Protestants are, maybe, over-careful in such matters, but I can't help thinking, whenever I look at that, of what St. Matthew tells us—that 'the earth did quake, and the rocks were rent.'"

I find the place and read on:

"And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many."

The saints that slept in the mighty cemetery lying along these hills from Olivet to Golgotha—the vanguard of the multitude which no man can number who shall stand beside the victorious Lord at the last day upon the earth.

PATIENT SUFFERERS.

A lady who accompanied one of the deaconnesses of Mildmay Park in her visits among the poor of London mentions two cases she saw which struck her as singularly pathetic. She says:

We visited a young widow a few days ago, and found her, as usual, almost hidden behind a pile of cardboard boxes, at which she was working busily. Four years ago her husband died, leaving with her two little girls to support, and she had to work. She remarked: "I have often worked for sixteen hours in the day, Miss, and have not tasted food all the time—but then, I don't mind as long as I can bring up the children properly," and she stops her work for a minute to kiss the children as they start for school, and to return their accustomed salutations, "God bye, mother, God bless you."

Another case was that of a young girl who had borne thirteen years of weakness and suffering, privation and poverty, and only eighteen years old! Poor little Annie has had a sad life so far as this world is concerned. A fall when a little child caused serious injury to the spine, and prevented her further growth. For months together she has had to lie in bed in the little living room occupied by the family, where meals have to be prepared and eaten and all the household work performed. Weary months of headache and the pain of spinal abscesses, when she is "so tired of lying down," and no change of posture gives her any rest. We are so glad when we are able to take her a little milk or fruit, as her father is often out of work, and she has to go without the necessary nourishment. And yet she is happy, for the joyous peace of God fills her heart, and she knows that all that He does is good.

AMONG THE KOORDS.

Sir Henry Layard's Experiences of Asiatic Travel—His first Visit to the Ruins of Ancient Nineveh.

THERE is no more interesting part of the career of the late Sir Henry Layard, explorer and orientalist, than that which relates to his experiences in Armenia and Koordistan. Alfred E. Lomax, his most recent biographer, writing of a journey from Aleppo along the Tigris, says:

"Without servants, guides, or escort, and trusting to Providence for forage, shelter, and provisions, the two travelers, Layard and his friend Mitford, left Aleppo. Their first resting-place was a cave in the side of a hill, which was shared by a herd of oxen and a party of fellahs, their only beds being a bundle of straw laid on the ground. The Turks in the various villages were, as a rule, very obliging. They often showed their good fellowship by making free with the travelers' pipes and tobacco without troubling to say "By your leave." They also thought nothing of going to the door and, thrusting their naked feet into the guests' boots or slippers, walk away through the mud, regardless of the fact that the owners might in the meantime require them. At Bir the travelers were informed that the road onward swarmed with robbers, and therefore they stopped in the city rather than attempt to go on in the darkness. An Armenian took them to his own house, but the women could neither be forced nor persuaded to admit the strangers. They were therefore obliged to lodge in an empty room under the walls of the ruined castle.

"At Orfa they fared better, and were received into an Armenian household. This place is supposed to be the Ur of Abraham, and there is a large mosque dedicated to the patriarch. Some of the people in the streets were not so friendly disposed towards the travelers, and indulged in very bad language. The women did not present a very agreeable appearance, as they wore veils of black horse-hair, which allowed them to see without being seen.

"After leaving Orfa, the travelers had their first experience of life among the Koords, who were described as 'cut-throats and plunderers.' This, however, was not true. Strangers who behave properly towards them receive good treatment at their hands. Layard and Mitford were passed from camp to camp, and from village to village. In one village they were lodged in "a horrible den," the mistress of which was so begrimed with smoke and dirt that her features were scarcely distinguishable. Unable to find shelter elsewhere, they had no choice but to remain and partake of the food prepared by this dirty woman. Another night they lodged in a hut with horses, donkeys, and wild-looking, filthy Arabs. Not liking the appearance of their companions, the travelers went to sleep with their weapons in their hands.

"At length they reached the famous river Tigris, which flowed majestically through a verdant valley, backed by rugged peaks and dark precipices. They crossed by means of a raft made of inflated goatskins, over which a frame of wood was fixed, and landed in Koordistan. 'My early impressions from reading travels,' says Mitford, 'had led me to imagine that every Turk was a brute, the Albanian a cut-throat, and Koord next of kin to a cannibal. I was agreeably deceived to find the Turks gentlemen; the Albanians, though far from heroes of romance, plain soldiers, and harmless if uninjured; and the Koords hospitable and good-natured, though all are merciless in time of war.'

"In four days the travelers reached the village of Telkif, where they saw the huge mounds which at that time were supposed to cover the ruins of ancient Nineveh. Though Layard regarded these remains with great interest, he little thought that he should make his name famous by restoring to the world the buried treasures which had been hidden there for hundreds of years.

"They made up a party to visit the mounds which formed the tomb of the glories of Nineveh. The principal mound, supposed to be the ruin of a large palace or temple, had just before been the scene of a terrible tragdy. At that time no one was able to say that the mounds were the site of the capital of Assyria, and the attempts previously made to explore them had been frustrated by the hostility of the Arabs. When the inhabitants of Mosul heard of the proposed expedition, they assured the travelers it was impossible for them to carry out their plans. Nay, they declared that they would never escape to return. Even the Turkish Pasha could not ensure safety, and it was deemed advisable not to take an escort. The party consisted of Layard, Mitford, Rassam, and Ainsworth, a servant named Ali to look after the horses, and one Turkish soldier. Each man carried a quilt or cloak strapped on to his saddle to serve as a covering at night, and Ali had charge of a bag of biscuits.

"On the third morning the Turkish soldier refused to go any farther for fear of falling into the hands of Arabs. He therefore turned back, and was never heard of again. On the fourth day the party approached an Arab encampment, and prepared to defend themselves if attacked, but were agreeably surprised when they received a friendly welcome. Seated round the fire, they were assailed with questions as to where they had come from and the object of their journey. The Arabs also expressed great surprise that the little party had got so far without being plundered and murdered. The usual food of the tribe was barley-bread, butter, and sour milk, but they killed a sheep in honor of their visitors.

"Though received in such a friendly manner, the explorers found that they were closely watched, and the Arabs never lost sight of them for a moment. They believed that the strangers were there to dig up buried treasures of the secret hiding-place of which they had been informed. It was quite clear that some of the Arabs were quite ready to join in an attack on the travelers at the least provocation.

"Many interesting remains were visited, and numerous sketches taken. No attempts were made to unearth the buildings, but notes of their position and size were put down. The stonework was covered with a variety of carvings of human figures and winged quadrupeds, with lions', eagles', and griffins' heads, placed face to face, holding heads or masks unders their raised paws. There were also numerous inscriptions which the explorers were unable to decipher. Having satisfied themselves of the great extent and importance of the ruins, the travelers decided to return to Mosul."

AFTER THE MILLENNIUM.

The Thousand Years of Peace to be Succeeded by a Period of Trial.

BY G. F. TRENCH.*

NOT so very long ago Christian people generally saw nothing ahead but the Judgment Day, the Last Day, the general dissolution of all things, and eternity beyond. But students of prophecy, telescope in hand, began to discern intermediate events—ranges of hills, so to speak, and mountains beyond them—and have proclaimed their discoveries with such a fervent "Eureka! Eureka!" that nowadays the old, crude belief is well-nigh broken down.

Instead of talking about the Last Day, like Martha in John 11, the saints are expecting, as she was then taught (vv. 25, 26, R. V.), the transformation of the living, and the resurrection of the sleeping, at the coming of the Lord: an event which, instead of closing the world's history, will—after the brief but most eventful epoch that it has ever passed through, for widespread suffering, cruelty, and war—introduce the reign of Christ on earth, and be in fact a morning star to tell of the coming sunrise.

From a mountain height which revelation affords, it has been already discovered that the stretch of waters that our forefathers had taken for the ocean is but an inland sea, circumscribed by most definite borders. But what is there beyond it? Is that shining field of light, whose calm face looks up to the ethereal blue, reflecting its tints beyond the broken edge of cliff and foam—is that eternity? Or may the prophetic telescope discover limits even there, and even in some small degree descry its features and ascertain its bourne? In plain words, is the Millennium the final age or limited period before eternity; or is there a further dispensation of fixed length, exceeding in glory all that came before it?

Now, what is the Millennium? For if this be the kingdom of the Son of Man in its final form, if it exhaust the prophecies and promises of his human glory as Redeemer-King, there is no more to be said. Then, indeed, when its failure has been shown by its terrible end, he will sadly deliver up the wreck and ruin of it to his Father, and God will be all in all. But is this true? To answer the question let us recall its locality, its moral character, and its end.

1. As to locality, the scene of the millennial reign is this planet—Earth (Psa. 72: 8-11; Isa. 11: 10-16); its centre, or metropolis of government is Jerusalem (Isa. 52: 1, 2, 7-10; Zech. 14: 16-21.)

2. The moral character of the Millennium is given in several passages (Dan. 9: 24, R. V., margin, "to restrain trangression and seal up sins;" Zech. 18, 19), as one of sin suppressed and life prolonged, while Satan remains imprisoned; and of sin revived in the most open and undisguised rebellion upon his release at the close of the thousand years, and the most frightful destruction of human life ever recorded since the days of Noah.

3. The end is a scene of war. Jerusalem, besieged already seventeen or eighteen times, is besieged again, this time by an innumerable host of all nations; who throughout that period of enforced truce have never forgotten their ancient hostility to the Jews and their Messiah. And, but for the Divine interposition, the scene of carnage so often enacted in the streets of the beloved city might be, and probably would be, repeated in a form many times more aggravated than ever before.

It should also be remembered that the great revolt, of which this siege is the terminus, will necessarily, from the account given, occupy a considerable time. To deceive the nations in the four quarters of the earth; to gather them together to battle in numbers "as the sand of the sea:" to mobilize such vast armies; to conduct them across "the breadth of the earth;" and finally to lay siege to Jerusalem, for what length of time we know not—all this proves that the "little season" of Rev 20: 3 must be understood in the light of similar Scriptural language.

*From his article in the London Christian. As will be seen, the author differs from other commentators in placing Armageddon after the Millennium.

SOUL-HUNGER.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 13, 1895. Psalm 84.

ONE of the most mysterious of Christ's utterances was that of his declaring that whosoever ate of his flesh should have eternal life. The Jews who heard him could not understand it, and the world cannot understand it to-day. The only man who does understand is he who knows that his soul —his real self—derives all its nourishment day by day from Christ. In many ways Christ tried, and for the greater part ineffectually, to make this profound spiritual truth plain to men. He did not come to teach, or to heal, or to rule, so much as to give life. Life, divine, eternal, was in him and he imparted it to such as could receive it. How it is imparted we do not know, but of the fact there can be no doubt in the mind of any one who has experienced it. Even to others the fact ought not to be so incredible as it is. Every one understands the necessity of food for the body. When a starving man faints from exhaustion, we know that food will restore his strength. We may not be able to explain how food taken into the stomach is transformed into bone and muscle and flesh. The broad fact is sufficient that food is necessary to life. We go further, and have no difficulty in understanding what is meant by mental food. We even discriminate as to quality, and tell a child that his mind will never be a strong and well-developed mind, if he persists in playing, when he should be studying, or if he will read nothing but trashy stories. The mind needs nourishment and the fact is perfectly understood. It should not be incomprehensible, therefore, that the soul also needs to be fed. The commonest experience points the truth. The time comes to all, when something is needed besides physical and mental support. In some bereavement, in some terrific crisis, in the face of some severe ordeal, a need is felt which nothing physical or mental can satisfy. Spiritual strength is required and to seek to gain it by anything but spiritual food, is as useless as it would be to try to prevent a house falling by strengthening the fence around the garden. Like must go to like, spiritual food for the spirit. This spiritual food comes from God through Christ. Like the physical food it must enter into the man to benefit him. How it can enter we know not, but we know the way to receive it. The Christian who neglects prayer, who seldom opens the Bible, who absents himself from the sanctuary, does not grow, does not gain strength. His soul is starved. He needs to come in contact with Christ by communion, by seeking to know his will and to do it, in striving to have his spirit and to live his life. So does he gain strength. His capacity for receiving the spiritual food increases simultaneously with his capacity for work. As with the body, a healthy appetite is developed by a healthy life. And, best of all the life derived from the nourishment is eternal. It survives the body, for they who eat of that bread live forever.

ONE CIRCLE'S WORK.

Mutual helpfulness and combined effort for the temporal and spiritual good of others is evidently the object of a circle of King's Daughters in Cleveland, O., the leader of which sends a report to headquarters, from which we extract the following: Nearly four years ago our circle commenced its work with a membership of twelve. We held regular business meetings and a prayer meeting every Sunday evening. Our work was helping to support a teacher among the mountain whites, and we gave a barrel of bedding to the same school. We regularly visited hospitals in our own city, carrying flowers, fruit, reading matter and Scripture verses. We also helped a poor mother with six children through a hard year. We carried on about the same work till July, 1891, when we undertook the support of a native helper in India, paying $70 per year. This we have continued up to this time. We have a very efficient worker, and are interested in him. Our meetings now consist of a prayer meeting, which has been kept up all these years, on Sunday evening, and evening meetings as follows: business meeting every alternate Wednesday, which is always a busy one, planning for the King's work. Bible study every Monday; we are now studying the book of Acts; twelve of our members are memorizing whole books of the Bible. Several of our members are organized into a local Circle of the C. L. S. C., which meets on Thursday. We also have a social once a month, its object being to help our members to know each other better and to draw in new members. We always have a literary and musical programme and we collect a dime from each, and this fund we use for local benevolent work. During the four years' work over one hundred persons have been actively connected with the Circle.

NOTABLE B. Y. P. U. MEETINGS.

Fairbault, Minn., was the scene of an inspiring gathering of Baptist Young People recently. It was a convention of the Unions of the Minnesota Central Association, and delegates attended from all the Unions. Rev. Charles A. Reese, of Minneapolis; Rev. John D. Rumsey, of Fairbault, and Rev. W. H. Whitney, of Austin, were the chief speakers among the pastors. The majority of the speakers were, however, laymen from the ranks of the Unions, and their speeches commanded special attention because of their practical character. No one can so thoroughly hold the attention of a young people's audience as the man who himself works in the regular meeting. An enthusiastic conference has been held also at Dayton, Ohio. The Unions of Southwestern Ohio were generally represented. From Springfield alone came seventy delegates, and other Unions sent large delegations. Dr. H. A. Cuffy, of Springfield; Rev. E. W. Hunt, of Toledo; President Purinton, of Denison University, with Rev. D. D. McLaurin, took part in the proceedings. The new State President, Mr. T. J Kirkpatrick, was also a prominent figure in the conference, which was mainly his own project. Reynoldsville, Pa., entertained the delegates of the Unions in the Clearfield Association on Dec. 6. The conference was a memorable one on several grounds, not least for the thrilling speech of Rev. Lemuel C. Barnes, of Pittsburg, who held the conference spellbound by his eloquence. In the course of his address he said he believed that "the time would come when the world would be as much better than Pennsylvania, as Pennsylvania is now better than Darkest Africa." This he believed would be brought about by a deeper apprehension of Christ. He said that "there are truths as vital and as radical yet to be discovered as ever Luther, Hubmaier, or Hetzer ever propounded to the world."

A PROJECTED Y.M.C.A. BUILDING.

Something novel in Young Men's Christian Association buildings is likely soon to add to the beauties of Chicago. The edifice of which a picture appears on this page has been designed for the use of the German-speaking young men of the city. The conception is as beautiful as it is novel. It is a successful attempt to combine the ecclesiastical style of architecture with a style appropriate for a busy city street. We hope that the Association will be able to raise the funds necessary for so handsome a home and will soon turn the architect's brilliant idea into solid stone. The Association has at present a membership of only 151, but with the increased facilities which the acquisition of such a home will afford the number of members will rapidly multiply and we may hope for it a career of wide and extensive usefulness.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

An enthusiastic convention in India is reported by the "Indian Witness." It included all the Chapters in the Madras district and was held in that city. The discussions were of a practical character, dealing with the working of the Leagues. "How to Conduct Devotional Meetihgs," "The Epworth Leaguer as a Good Samaritan," "The Best kind of Reading for Epworthians," "The Ingredients of a Successful Monthly Social," "The Aims and Results of Junior League Work;" were the topics of the chief papers. They show that in India the Epworth League is appreciated and that its members believe time well spent in the study of its methods.——Kewanee, Ill., was the rendezvous of over two hundred Epworth League delegates, who came for a three days' conference early in December. A correspondent of the "Epworth Herald" gives a glowing report of the condition of the League throughout that section which is based on the statements of the delegates. They represented the four Districts of Rock Island, Macomb, Peoria and Galesburg. There are, it appears, in the four districts an aggregate of 137 Senior Leagues with a combined membership of 6,610 and sixty-two Junior Leagues with a total membership of 3,134. Bishop Bowman and pastors Luckey and Cullen were the chief speakers.—The Epworth League of Detroit, Mich., is taking the lead in the Good Citizenship movement. It recently invited all the Young People's societies in the city to meet in the Tabernacle Church to take combined action for the better enforcement of law in the community—Preparations are being made for the convention of the German chapters which is to be held in Chicago in July next. Committees have been appointed to arrange for the entertainment of delegates for transportation and for the programme. This will be a national Convention.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The sixteen Endeavor Societies of Reading, Pa., have organized a good-citizenship committee, representing the sixteen churches, with the object of reforming local politics.

A Baptist Young People's Union has now been organized in connection with each of the twelve Baptist churches in Richmond, Va. A year ago only three churches in the city had Unions.

More life and activity is being manifested in the Epworth League, says the "St. Louis Christian Advocate,' in Missouri and throughout the entire Church at the present time than ever before in its history.

Bridgeport, Conn., was recently the scene of an enthusiastic convention of the Epworth League of the New York District. From the report it appears that the District League is composed of fifty-six Chapters, with a membership of forty-two hundred and seventy-nine. Five new Chapters were added the past year.

The Epworth Era says: The records of the central office show that we have almost as many chartered Leagues in the Northwest Texas Conference as in all the other Conferencns together. This is a fine showing for that part of the field.

During a revival conducted recently under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association at Detroit, Mich., twenty-five of the members organized into a band and raided the saloons every evening seeking possible converts and were very successful.

The Young Men's Christian Association of New Orleans, La., has commenced the erection of its new building, the cost of which will be $42,449.

Delegates from Christian Endeavor Societies were present at the first annual meeting of the Dakota Union of Indian Societies. The report of the Cleveland Convention was given in both English and Dakota by Jonas Spotted Bear, who spoke for his people at the convention.

Inteeest in the Epworth League has greatly increased during the past year, says the Nashville "Christian Advocate," especially in those sections of the Church which before were aroused on the subject. There has been a growth of more than one hundred per cent. in the North Carolina Conference.

Seventeen members of South Australian Christian Endeavor Societies are laboring in foreign missionary fields. The denomination missionary boards there furnish to the societies list of articles needed by different missionaries in order that the Endeavorers may pray definitely for these workers every day.

The New Year's Festival.

It is a very Ancient Observance—How other Nations Celebrate it—The Day in Old New York, 200 Years ago.

SO extremely ancient is the custom of welcoming the advent of the new year, with festivity and song, that it is difficult to determine precisely at what point in the world's history the observance began. Among the ancient Jews, one of the great "holy days" was the Feast of Trumpets, and it has been duly honored among them from "the giving of the Law" up to the present time. The festival of the new year was designed to draw the attention of the people to the significance and importance of the Day of Atonement, to which it was preparatory, and it has passed into Jewish history as "the day of the blowing of the silver trumpets," the blasts being a summons to enter upon the work of sanctification and to effect a reconciliation with God. Like the Sabbath, the New Year festival was to be a day of rest from all labor. After sacrifice, psalms and festival prayers in the temple, the families went to their homes and there enjoyed a social repast. In the evening they again visited the temple, witnessed the evening sacrifice and the lighting of the golden candlestick, and at the conclusion, they exchanged congratulations in such terms as: "May you be written down for a happy new year," or "May the Creator decree for you a happy new year," to which the response was given: "And you likewise." With the exception of the temple sacrifices and possibly of some slight and unimportant modifications in the form, the ceremony of the New Year festival is preserved to-day among the Jewish people almost unchanged in the thousands of years that have passed away.

But the New Year festival is found, as an immemorial usage, among other ancient peoples, notably the Egyptians, Persians, Hindoos, Chinese, Romans, and Moslems, although their calendars varied as to the date of the jubilee. In ancient Rome, the year began with March, and on the first day of that month, the "Salii," or priests of the god Mars, bore the sacred shield in procession through the city, while the people feasted and rejoiced. When the Roman calendar was changed the date of the festival was transferred to January 1st. People wished each other health and prosperity and exchanged gifts. But the celebration, both public and private, partook so strongly of a pagan character that the early Christian churches, among their own people, transformed it into a religious festival and by degrees the popular rioting and excess were greatly modified.

Among the Hindus, the day is called, Prajapatya, "the day of the Lord of Creation," and is sacred to Ganesa, the god of wisdom, who is worshipped with sacrifices, illuminations and general rejoicings. In China (there as in India, being of a different date), it is a festival of thanksgiving and good-will, and so also in Japan. In ancient Persia prisoners were liberated and debts forgiven. In Mexico, temples and houses are adorned and the festival is of a religious character. Among the various nations of Europe, the day is observed by the pleasant interchange of social courtesies, by visits and the giving of presents.

MAKING NEW YEAR'S CALLS IN NEW YORK, TWO HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

In our own land, in a modified degree, the New Year festival is observed, although the proximity of Christmas deprives it of much of its enthusiasm and importance. In the old Dutch days, when the thriving settlement of Nieuw Amsterdam was gradually growing to the proportions of a city with some few comforts and refinements, the day was observed with a hearty spirit of hospitable sociability for which the Hollanders were famous. Greater even than Kerstrydt (Christmas), Paas (Easter), and Pinxter (Whitsuntide), Nieuw Jar was the most enjoyable holiday of the whole twelvemonth. Christmas was a double anniversary, being also celebrated by general consent as the anniversary of "Landing Day," but Nieuw Jar was devoted to social enjoyment, making and receiving calls and to feasting. For days in advance the thrifty housewives were kept busy baking, brewing and preparing appetizing dinners, to which came not only the neighbors but friends from distant points sometimes even as far as Fort Orange (Albany). Those quaint old Dutch dining-rooms in New Amsterdam must have been a goodly picture, with their long tables loaded with haunches of venison, turkeys roasted whole, their shining silver tankards and quaint table-ware and their piles of cakes, comfits and confectionery, with the groups of jolly, sturdy burghers feasting and joking, while their vrouws and daughters, all bravely clad, welcomed the new arrivals and dispensed the hospitalities of the house. In the great, open fire-places, twelve feet wide, the logs crackled and blazed, adding the ruddy, comfortable glow of fire-light to the light of the candles, and giving the finishing touch to a scene of comfort and enjoyment that was in striking contrast to the wintry exterior. Such was New Year's day in New York over two centuries ago.

Womanly Sympathy.

The want of sympathy and charity which women feel for the faults of their own sex, says a thoughtful writer, is well known; but exactly why this is the case is hard to tell. It may be that because the consequences of a woman's faults are so severe, that a well-balanced woman cannot understand their commitment and so judge of them. But certain it is that this want of feeling exists. One may well ask, when the accused is of their own sex, where is the sympathy? Where are kindly feelings expressed and heard? Much good could women do in this world if they would abandon the selfish feeling that too often finds expression against their own sex.

A New Year's Thought.

In the "Century," W. D. Howells has some beautiful verses on the closing year, from which we take these (supposed to be written by Father Time), as specially appropriate to the season:

Do you wish me, then, away?
You should rather bid me stay:
Tho' I seem so dull and slow,
Think before you let me go!

Whether you entreat or spurn
I can nevermore return:
Times shall come, and times shall be,
But no other time like me.

Tho' I move with leaden feet,
Light itself is not so fleet:
And before you know me gone
Eternity and I are one.

THE HAPPIEST HEART.

WHO drives the horses of the sun
Shall lord it but a day;
Better slowly the deed were done,
And kept the humble way.

The rust will find the sword of fame,
The dust will hide the crown;
Ay, none shall nail so high his name
Time will not tear it down.

The happiest heart that ever beat
Was in some quiet breast
That found the common daylight sweet

A HOME RECEPTION IN CHINA.

WRITING from China, Bishop Galloway gives this entertaining description of a visit to the home of a wealthy and cultured native: "He is said to count his gold by the half-million. His house, fronting on the narrow, crowded street, seemed not unlike many others; but in the rear, where the family dwell, there are numerous, spacious, and elaborately-decorated and furnished apartments. We were received with great grace and cordiality, and invited to the seats of honor in a model Chinese reception-room. Immediately tea was served in the costliest china—the tea without cream or sugar, and each cup with a handsome cover of the same ware. That is to preserve the fragrant aroma of the delicious tea. In a few moments he served other dishes on a silver waiter, which afforded our party the greatest pleasure as they partook of them one after another.

"Into a large reception hall for feasts and distinguished guests, adorned with swinging lanterns and rich carvings, we were conducted and shown the various articles of interest. Adjoining was the schoolroom, in which three of his four sons were being instructed by a private teacher. The oldest, a handsome youth of seventeen, was married last year. His wife was an inmate of the family. I am told as many as four generations sometimes live within the same compound. In another part of the house there was a room and teacher for his four daughters. The ladies and their apartments, of course, were not visible, but we had reason to believe that they were not denied a sight of the foreign guests.

"He then led us into his beautiful garden, fragrant with blooming tea olive and radiant with a variety of fruits and flowers. In the centre was an octagonal tea-house, over which delicate vines were tastefully twined, and where again we were served with the Chinaman's favorite beverage from plants grown in the host's native province. I have not often met a gentleman with manners so graceful and a bearing more distinguished. With many well-wishes, and a cordial invitation to accept his hospitality at any time, we were bidden a friendly good-bye. Thus a long coveted opportunity was enjoyed—seeing the inside of a cultured, high-class, Chinese home. The humble huts of the coolies, and the malodorous haunts of the laundrymen in America, give no idea what the Chinese can be and are, when uplifted by education and culture."

How to be Happy.

Would'st thou be happy? Take an easy way:
Think of them 'round you—live for them all day;
Think of their pain, their grief, their loss, their care—
All that they have to do, or feel, or bear:
Think of their pleasure, of their good, their gain;
Think of those 'round thee—'twill not be in vain.

CHAPTER XXX.

Forgotten Altercations.

"COME in, Mrs. Somers!" called out a woman's voice from the room, "that is if ye can git in. The steps is gettin mighty shackly."

"How do you do, Mrs. Flint, and how is your husband?"

"Jim's jest as bad as he kin be. Come right in, you and the lady."

They went in, and after speaking to Mr. Flint and introducing Annie, Mrs. Somers said:

"Are you no better, Mr. Flint?"

"No ma'am, I git worse all the time—don't know what a minute's ease is and never sleep a wink without morphine."

"No," said his wife, taking up the story, "he never sleeps one mite 'thout powerful big doses of morphy, and he goes on so, I can't sleep neether."

The man was lying on a plain, coarse lounge with one leg in a box, a long, rude, pine box, and it was bandaged so as to secure it against moving. The wife eager to talk, turned to Annie and said:

"You see, Jim, he works in the lumber yard out'n the edge of town, and one day as the train come whizzin' by, Jim, he never seed a piece of lumber close to him stickin' out, and the cars knocked it and that knocked Jim and he fell, and a lot of lumber fell on him and his leg was just broke and tore most to pieces. The doctors want to cut it off, but Jim won't let um come here hackin' on him. They told him, one day, that he'd die, but Jim just told um that if he had to die he just meant to be buried with his two legs. I was powerful glad, for I didn't want no one-legged man for my old man."

There was a grunt of some kind from the lounge, whether of dissatisfaction from the husband or assent, Annie could not tell, but Mrs. Somers asked:

"Is there any delicacy that I can send you; perhaps you can think of something you would fancy."

"You've been so kind already, I hate to trouble you."

"Don't be afraid to ask. Your appetite is so poor, I will be glad to make anything I can to tempt it. What is it you think you would like?"

"I once saw some kind of yellow jelly, that looked like clear gold, and I've been thinking of that lately, for as I see it, it looks so nice and cool, and 'pears to me I could eat that."

"Gelatine," suggested Annie.

"Gelatine!" exclaimed his wife. "It seems like it ought to be ought to be gela-gold and not gela-tin."

"Well, you may call it what you please, it makes no odds to me, I shan't quarrel with the name, but 'pears to me like—but then it's too much trouble, I mustn't ask it."

"I'll make you some, Mr. Flint," and Annie spoke eagerly. "It will be no trouble at all; and I hope it will do you good. You seem very feeble. I wish I could make you something else nourishing. Suppose I make you some syllabub, too, and send with the gelatine?"

"All right. I'll be much obleeged, you are very kind."

"Well. Mr. Flint, now how comes on the soul, while your body is so feeble?"

"Feeble too, I'm afeered, Miss Somers."

"My friend and brother, can't you trust in Jesus and feel that all things work together for good? You are a professing Christian, a member of the Methodist Church. Has the Saviour you profess to love, been close to you since I last saw you? Can you now trust him implicitly?"

"I've been praying, and trying to trust, and trying to believe that it's all right, but it's mighty hard, mighty hard. Now I think I could believe, if I was walking round and at my work again. I think I could believe that all was working good for them that loves God, but it's hard work when you're flat on your back, sufferin' and nothin' to give your wife and children to eat, and no hope of things gettin' any better fast. I tell you it's hard to trust then, I know, for I've tried it. You can't live on trust, it wont give you food nor clothes; it wont stop pain nor make your leg whole when it's broke, and it wont give a man work when he get's crawlin' 'bout, I know. Once, birds brought meat for men and bread fell down from the sky, and water spirted out a rock, but not now. Them days is past, no such things happens to poor folks now. Somewhere in the Bible, I don't know where, it says, God helps them that helps theirselves. That's the way the world is run now, and when folks gets past helpin' theirselves. they don't get helped. That's the way now."

Mrs. Somers waited patiently till he was through, and then said very quietly, "No, that is not in the Bible. Mr. Flint, have your wife and children ever gone without a meal since you've been sick?"

"No'm, I dunno as they have exactly, but then——"

"Stop a moment, I only want to ask you a question or two for my satisfaction. Have you ever suffered for anything you needed since you've been lying here?"

"No'm, but then you know somebody would just happen to come in?"

"Nothing ever just happens, Mr. Flint, it is all ordered by a good God. Have you not had all the medicine you needed?"

"Yes'm, I believe I have."

"Has not Dr. Gordon been kind and attentive?"

"Oh! yes, mighty, mighty. He is a good kind man, and I mean to——"

"Haven't you a good wife, Mr. Flint?"

"Yes'm, I have."

"And your children, what about them?"

"They are as good as anybody's got."

"And has not George succeeded in getting into a good place as errand boy?"

"Yes'm."

"Has not God been good, Mr. Flint?"

"Oh! yes; I didn't know how good till you began to count up," and the man's eyes were swimming in tears and a handkerchief came out from under the pillow, which he pressed to his face. Mrs. Somers was a good soul doctor, and she went on:

"Never say again, my dear friend, that our heavenly Father isn't good. He is, oh! he is so good. That passage you mentioned is not in the Bible, Mr. Flint: there are no such words there. On the contrary, God helps those who cannot help themselves. Don't murmur at him, my brother, when he is doing everything for you. Trust him who has proved himself such a good friend to you in trouble, so careful of you, so worthy of yoar childlike confidence. Go to him, and tell him how your poor unbelieving heart is tempted, and he will pity you, and give you faith to trust his promises, even though the way seems dark. Now, I want to pray with you, and ask him for you, that you may not be tempted above what you are able to bear, and that he will make you a little child in faith, implicit trust and meekness."

Then, around the couch the three women bowed, and one poured out her full heart to heaven for the poor, tried, suffering child; and when they arose and the farewells were spoken, it was in low, soft, tremulous tones.

As Annie and Mrs. Somers parted, just at sunset, Annie said, with deep feeling,

"Mrs. Somers, I thank you for the lessons I have learned this afternoon. I have lived in this city all my life, but I never once dreamed that there was so much suffering in it before."

"Ah! my dear, I have only shown you two families. Come again when you can, for there are others still. Don't forget your gelatine."

"Never! I feel that that promise of mine was made to my Saviour. Could I cause that tempted man to distrust Jesus because I fail? Oh! no! no! His gracious promise shall be fulfilled in me: my act shall verify it. What a privilege to be God's errand child!"

So they parted, Mrs. Somers to pursue her quiet duties, Annie to fulfil her promise.

A large glass bowl of sparkling, quivering amber, and a brimful bowl of frothy syllabub; a broiled chicken, made savory with rich butter and black pepper, snow-flaky bread, and a dish of sweet peach pickles—these went on a waiter under a fine damask towel to the house of Mr. Flint, the morning following the visit. The sweet odor of the evening prayer was still in the room, and its dewy influence rested upon the hearts of the occupants.

"Only see, Jim!" Exclaimed his wife as she lifted the white cover. "If you can't eat this, you can't eat nothin.' Somehow it's gest as Miss Somers says, 'God ain't forgot us.'"

"God's too good!" said Jim with feeling. "I don't see how he can be so good to me when I've been so mean to him. Oh! how nice and beautiful this waiter is. Flowers, too! As if he hadn't sent enough when he sent me food, he had to send some sweet roses, too. Well, he is good!"

"Wait till I empty everything and give the girl her things, and then I'll bring them to you."

"Tell the servant to come here," said Jim. When the girl stood by him, he said:

"Tell the lady, I thank God for he sent her."

The message was delivered to Annie verbatim, and no sweeter thanks would she have desired.

When the food was laid by the poor man, he closed his eyes, folded his hands and asked a blessing. Then he ate. How nice it all was; how tender the chickens, how light the bread, how delicious the gelatine and syllabub, and savory the pickles! His wife must eat this, the children must have that, and when he could eat no more, refreshed and strengtened, he laid his head upon his pillow, saying:

"I'll never, never, doubt, him again! I said he did not send birds now with bread, but I tell you, Polly, he sent two angels here yesterday — they were just angels, Polly."

"Miss Somers, she's been an angel comin' here a long time, Jim, but somehow or 'nother, I never see it so plain as I did yesterday. That other one, seem to me I could gest see her wings ready to fly."

"It don't take wings to make angels, and everything that's got wings ain't angels, but God sent angels to me, sure. It's so easy to trust him when your waiter's full and your stomach, too. but I won't doubt him again when they are both empty. Oh! Lord, I promise not to doubt thee any more!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

An Old Friend.

The next afternoon, according to promise, Annie was with Mrs. Somers again.

"I sent a waiter," she said, "over to Mr. Flint, and he sent me word, that he thanked God, for it was God who sent me. I was so glad to receive those words, for it proved that he was trusting more."

"He was much softened," Mrs. Somers replied, "when we left. I did not think he appeared quite so rebellious. He has had a trying time, been lying there a month, and his wife has not been able to go on with the washing which she had taken in, but lately his little boy has succeeded in securing a good place with my brother-in-law, and this helps out considerably. Dr. Gordon thinks now that he will recover, though it has been a difficult and doubtful case. Are you acquainted with Dr. Gordon?"

"I have known him for several years. He did not visit us very often, owing, I suppose, to his pressing business, for he always pleaded that as his excuse. I always included him in my invitations, however, for though he was poor, I always regarded him as a sensible, high-minded, noble man."

"He is rising rapidly. I have never seen a man who has won my esteem and confidence in so short a time. I know him through the poor. They love him, and whom they love I must love. His labors are gratuitously given to them, and he is so attentive. The best of all is that he carries his religion into the sick-room and ministers to the soul as well as to the body."

"I understand that he is to be married very soon. You remember, perhaps, the young lady who visited Capt. Roland's last winter. Rumor says she is to be his wife."

"Happy woman, to be the wife of so noble a man. Our visit this afternoon takes us down on the river, and as it is some distance from here, we must start early to accomplish anything. I shall take you to see two more of my afflicted ones, so nerve yourself up to see suffering. There is a great deal in this wide world, and those who would do good must accustom themselves to witnessing it. We can teach the afflicted lessons our Saviour would have them learn, and we can teach our own hearts lessons of contentment. I once heard a minister say that the greatest affliction God could send upon a creature was poverty. What do you think of that, dear?"

"I do not agree with him. Poverty is a blessing sometimes, Mrs. Somers. Why, I think he made a hasty and very sweeping assertion. In my own case, poverty was a bright blessing: for work which poverty required was the first thing which ever gave me my happiness, for this brought me more than evanescent, fleeting pleasure. There was something deeper, a happier joy, if I may call it so, because I knew and felt that it would be lasting. I had found the joys of my gay life like the apples of Sodom, and, like them, they turned to ashes as I pressed them to my eager lips. Action brought some abiding happiness, but religion alone brought that peace which passeth knowledge, the joy that endureth forever."

"You are right," replied Mrs. Somers. "Poverty is not the worst affliction; to many it is a blessing, as it proved to you. It is not the rich man who is the happy man. There is a middle condition of life which is the happy mean: it is this state for which Agur prayed when he said, 'Give me neither poverty nor riches.' This is the happiest class. The rich are, as a rule, drawn aside by their riches, either to pleasure or ambition, and so find it hard to give their attention to religion; and the poor are so often wearied with work, or are so occupied with anxiety as to their daily bread, that they have no thought to spare for the things of the soul. Yes, it is hard for both classes. Agur's desire was best. But in whatever condition we may be, religion comes as a blessing, with special help for the difficulties of that condition. If people only knew what happiness there is in it, all would seek it."

The talk was interrupted by Mrs. Somers stopping at the door of a cottage. She said: "Here we are at Mrs. Edgefield's. She is a policeman's wife, and she is suffering from an incurable disease."

A woman answered the rap, and her salutation was:

"Come in, Mrs. Somers, we were looking for you."

The afflicted woman was lying on a single bed which had been drawn up to the open window. Everything was neat and clean. Flowers brightened the mantle; there was a vase on the table and a hint of violets everywhere.

"My dear sister, how are you to day?" said Mrs. Somers, going forward. "I have brought my friend, Mrs. Deveraux, to see you."

"I am so glad to see you both. I thought you would come this evening, Sister Somers. Sophie and I were just wishing for you."

"Mrs. Deveraux here, is a young Christian who is anxious to work for her Saviour, and I am introducing her to some of the suffering of our city, so that she can learn to soothe and sympathize."

"My dear young sister, I am doubly glad to see you, for these are good lessons to learn. I thank my kind friend for bringing you here."

"Thank you, Mrs. Edgefield. One would never class you with the suffering, afflicted of earth, you are so bright and cheerful."

"Ah! child, it is good for me to be afflicted, I needed it. It is a different school from any I ever went to before, but it's a higher grade, you see, the lessons are longer and harder, but that is just as it should be. What does all this matter? I shall soon stand my examination, shall get my diploma, with my School-master's signature, signed in letters of blood."

All this was said with a smile and with a playful air as though she was saying the most pleasant thing in the world. Annie said: "Mrs. Edgefield, I understood that you were a great sufferer, that your disease was—"

She hesitated, but Mrs. Edgefield finished the sentence with a smile.

"An incurable cancer, my dear, it is true. I suffer with what my physician tells me is a cancer, and it is gradually sapping my life away. He has prescribed opiates to deaden my pain, but I avoid them as much as possible."

Christians Persecuted in Greece.

DURING a period of two years, the Greek Protestant congregation at Ordu, near Trebizond, on the Black Sea, has been prevented by the authorities from worshipping on the Lord's day. The prohibition arose from the effort of influential Greek clergy, and was based upon their statement that the Protestant place of worship was too near the Greek church. Although a government commission examined the question and reported that there is no real reason for objections on the part of the Greeks, the Porte in order to please the Greek clergy, directed Protestant worship to be suspended until an Imperial firman could be obtained, authorizing the use of a house for the purpose. After a delay of two years the delivery of the Imperial firman seemed no nearer than ever, and the British Embassy called the attention of the Porte to the violation of religious liberty involved in the suppression of this Protestant service. On the twentieth of May, the Protestants met by authorization of the Porte, for worship in the house for which they had asked an Imperial firman. A great mob of Greeks then collected and stoned the house, smashing the windows, sashes, and even the iron shutters by which the windows were protected. This attack continued during seven hours, during which time the congregation of 350 was besieged in their place of worship, being held back by the pastor from hurling back the stones of the mob, and being ultimately extricated from their perilous position by the police. The Greeks profess to act under orders of their Patriarch at Constantinople.

JAPAN AND FOREIGNERS.

Writing of the attitude of Japan toward foreigners in January "Scribner's," Prof. G. F. Ladd says: "The real and predominating attitude of the popular mind toward 'the foreigner,' is still the same unreasonable sentiment that it has ever been. A few, and only a very few, even of the educated Japanese, have any intelligent and sympathetic knowledge of that type of mental life which has been developed by a Western and Christian civilization. Among the people of all classes, uninformed, unreasoning feeling toward all foreigners still underlies the crust of enforced or selfish and conventional politeness. This sentiment is a mixture of surprise and admiration with repulsion and contempt. A well-principled, or even a cosmopolitan, feeling toward all humankind, an 'enthusiasm of humanity,' is a rare and difficult thing to find in Japan. What but the knowledge of this mental attitude of his countrymen could have influenced an intelligent native preacher to say, in extremest praise of the power of divine grace: 'It can make you love even a foreigner!'"

BREAD MADE OF WOOD.

A curious statement is published in a German paper, "Die Kontinentale Holtz-Zeitung," which announces that the fabrication of food products consisting partly of wood is now an accomplished fact. At Berlin a factory has been built, which is turning out about two hundred quintals of "wooden bread" a day. The mode of preparation consists in fermenting sawdust and subjecting it to divers chemical manipulations, after which it is mixed with one-third farina and prepared like ordinary bread. The product at present serves only as feed for horses, and it appears that the Berlin Tramway Company, which is the most important customer of the factory, declares itself enchanted with the effects of this nourishment. The manufacturers declare that "wooden bread" constitutes also an excellent aliment for man, whose stomach, it seems, digests it at least as well as ordinary bread. If what is claimed for the new discovery be true, it is certainly a triumph of science, but like the "lime-dust flour," so widely written of in France some years ago, it is more likely to prove a disappointment.

A SAILOR'S WORK FOR CHRIST.

"I remember a young Scandinavian sailor," writes a missionary, "who came to one of our great seaports. He was just like the majority of sailors, a happy-go-lucky fellow, taking life as it turned up, and if it were bad luck to-day, hoping for good luck to-morrow. He had been two or three times to our country, and had each time been invited to evangelistic meetings which were held near the docks, specially for seamen; but on all previous occasions he had been too busy to attend to the affairs of his immortal soul. This voyage, however, we got him in. When God's love, and the wonderful sacrifice of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, was brought home to him, the poor fellow completely broke down, and in faltering accents made known his intention of coming to Christ at once and publicly confessing him before his shipmates. This we encouraged him to do, and he left us that night rejoicing with a new-born joy, such as only the redeemed know. He was with us for two or three evenings, and then his ship sailed, and we did not see him again for some months. Then, when he did come, he did not come alone. While absent, he had been about his Master's service, and two had been born into the kingdom through his instrumentality."

MURDER IN HIS HEART.

A native preacher in India, while on a tour among the hills, came at night to "dharmsala" (rest house), and found the place already occupied by a man and woman. The preacher asked the man who he was and whither he was traveling. The man replied that he was a Rajput, the head man of a certain village and now was on his way with his wife, who was a leper, to a certain village where was a doctor who would cure her of her disease. The preacher replied, I live in that village myself and no doctor lives there. After further conversation the Rajput took the preacher aside and said, The truth is I am going with this leper to the Ganges to throw her into the stream. The preacher at once began to warn the man not to commit such a crime; explained the commandments to him and at last made the man agree to pray with him; so the three kneeled together and the preacher prayed for the man and the woman as best he could. After prayer the man, who seemed quite broken hearted, said to the preacher, I will not go to the Ganges or do at all as I had intended. I am very sorry now. In the morning the preacher whose way led toward the Ganges, said to the man, I am going toward the Ganges, if you are going that way we will travel together. The man replied, No, I am going back to my own village, and will provide a house for this woman and will care for her as long as she lives.

AN ARTIST WITHOUT ARMS.

Art critics in London have been much interested, lately, over the work of Bertram Hiles, of Bristol, an artist without arms. Mr. Hiles had both arms amputated above the elbow, as the result of a tram-car accident when he was eight years old. Only two years after his accident, he had so far mastered the control of his pencil, held in his mouth, that he was placed in first-class division of the second grade of free-hand drawing of the National School at Bristol, and he was only sixteen when he exhibited a work at the local academy of pictures. For the next few years he studied so assiduously and successfully, that in 1890 he carried away a scholarship open to the competition of the United Kingdom, of one hundred guineas, and tenable for two years, offered by the National Art Department of South Kensington. Since then he has gained prizes for designs for a fan and a finger-plate. A water-jug and ewer, painted in five hours, won him a silver medal last year at South Kensington, where his skill in modeling in clay with his lips, was rewarded by his being classed in the first division. A beautiful sunset effect at Venice was hung at the Gallery of the Society of British Artists. Mr. Hiles is a cheery, good-looking, and intelligent man of twenty-eight. He seems to suffer but little inconvenience on account of his misfortune. His lips appear to serve him nearly as efficiently as hands do to most people. This shows that a man's facilities are not always the measure of his achievements. It is so in philanthropic and religious work. The most useful people are often those like Muller and others who have none of the resources which are considered essential to the work.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

Fighting Famine in the West.

The Pitiful Condition of the Kansas and Nebraska Farmers—Grateful for "The Christian Herald's" Help—Waging a Desperate Battle with Starvation.

EVERY day brings new and harrowing details of the widespread destitution and suffering among the farmers of Kansas and Nebraska. A number of our readers, responding to the appeals published in this journal, have kindly forwarded boxes of clothing and supplies to the sufferers at different points in the afflicted States, and their aid, together with the money appropriated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the relief of thirty of the most urgent cases, has been received with expressions of the warmest gratitude; but these are merely as a drop in the ocean, when the great extent of the destitution and the numbers of the sufferers are considered. Letters have been received in this office from over one hundred different localities in the two States, and each repeats the same story of almost hopeless privation; fine farms destroyed by the two years' drought; empty barns and still emptier larders; stock dying for want of feed, and men, women and children weak from prolonged hunger and freezing for lack of clothing and fuel. It is impossible to over-estimate the calamity that has overtaken a once fertile and industrious section of our Union. Everything is needed that human aid and Christian charity can supply, and it is needed most urgently. In one case, near Niobrara, Neb., a sick mother and two little children starved to death in their lonely cabin. This is only one case of many.

Pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might easily be filled with tear-stained letters containing stories of privation, borne patiently and uncomplainingly until hope itself seemed dead; of homes cheerless and cold that once were bright and comfortable; of strong men and women made weak by the long struggle with adversity. It has been a sad Christmas in those shadowed homes, and the New Year finds them in the depths of a misery that can hardly be imagined by those who are surrounded by many comforts and blessing in their own households. Unless substantial relief comes soon, the crisis though which our Western brothers and sisters are passing must end in emigration from the scene of their sufferings, or many must die if they are left to continue the struggle. All money contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be acknowledged and applied through our corps of volunteer distributors. Boxes of clothing and supplies should be sent direct to any of the distributors whose names are given in the list below or who were included in the list in last week's issue.

How the Children Suffer.

Emma L. R. Smith, Cozad, Neb., gives this most interesting account of the suffering there: "We could stand one failure and look hopefully forward to another seed-time, but when a second failure comes and a worse one than the first, it is hard to bear. We thought we had little last year, but we have less now. People struggled through last year looking hopefully forward to the coming sowing-time. Many of my neighbors went in debt for their seed this spring and literally obeyed the good rhythmic injunction:

> Sow in the morn thy seed,
> At eve hold not thy hand.
> To doubt and fear give thou no heed,
> Broadcast it o'er the land.

Farmers worked early and late and hundreds of acres of wheat were sowed just in our neighborhood. When it became evident that the wheat crop was a failure, corn was listed in on the wheat ground, and when the corn dried up, some farmers said they would sow flax if there came a rain, but the rain did not come, so they saved their flaxseed. I never saw men and women grow haggard and careworn in a short time as I have seen this summer.

"Passing along the road one day, I saw a father and four children cultivating corn; the oldest about thirteen years of age had a team and a harrow; the brother next his age was also harrowing, while a still younger brother and their father were each cultivating. The smallest boy was not large enough to drive his team and hold the plow handles at the same time, so a seat was fixed on the plow and the youngest of the family—little Blanche—was perched upon it, holding the lines and guiding the horses, while Willie held the plow handles. I could not help thinking that they deserved to succeed, but they have not a grain of corn for what they put into the ground. The father is now about one hundred miles northwest of here, where he had to take his cattle and horses for the winter. There he could get hay. There with the help of his wife and children he built a shanty for himself, put up hay for his stock and built sheds for them, while his family return home to spend a lonely winter. This family of whom I am speaking have now nothing for themselves to eat. [Horses and cattle cannot be sold—cannot even be given away. He who has least is richest.) I have given this woman a little for immediate needs."

"Many would be glad of warm overcoats. The stock has all to be turned out as there is very little feed," writes M. Masterson, Selkirk, Kan." The story of destitution here is too true and the half has not been told. About one hundred families have had help to a meagre supply of clothing, and there are not less than five hundred here who must have clothing, food and fuel."

Warm Clothing Needed.

Julia Kissinger, Leoti, Kan., writes: "Many are needing clothing, lots of people in Western Kansas; any kind, from small children to grown-up men."

Mrs. M. M. Butler, Childress, Texas, writes: "We live near the line of Hall and Childress counties. This portion of the country has been visited by droughts for three years in succession. I know of several families in need. Many families left here. We were too poor to get away. If our wheat fails this time, which I think it will, I don't know what we can do. How we are to get through the winter is a mystery as yet."

Mrs. Clara R. Pence, Macksville, Kan., writes: "Whatever is done or can be done should be done quickly or many will suffer. I offer my services to act as distributor of anything that may be sent."

Rev. N. A. Axling, Gothenburg, Neb., writes: "If we could get a bit of clothing to distribute among the most destitute in and around our vicinity we would be very grateful. It would be a blessed gift for the many poor. There is a great number of families who have no money, clothing and fuel; only rags for shoes and clothing. Numbers of children are deprived of their schooling, owing to having no clothes."

Mrs. Sarah Burton, Culberson, Neb., in a letter descriptive of the hardships the poor are undergoing this winter, says: "We have sod houses, a sod church and have Sunday School every Sunday, and Christian Endeavor and prayer meeting once a week. I miss so many of late! I know they lack caps, etc., for the children. I made about twenty pairs of mittens last winter but this winter I could not get any yarn. Oh, dear! we none of us raised even potatoes this year. I do not see what will become of us all, but we think and pray. Heretofore the Lord has helped us and we put our trust in him."

Starving Homes.

P. S. S., Logan, Kan., writes: "I have lost all my crops these two years . . . During last summer, I spent the last cent I had on earth to help the destitute families, for I have been in their homes, and I saw little children without a mouthful of bread to eat for their breakfast. Our own people are unable to take care of the needy ones, and the worst time is to come yet. Snow means starvation and death to the horses and cattle, because feed is scarce and stock is in a pitiful condition. You folks in the East will never realize our condition until you visit this country for awhile. I have been a Christian since I was twelve years old, but I never was so discouraged in my life, and I often wonder, has God indeed changed, for he has helped me in every time of need, but this seems the test of my life. I see no way out for all is as dark as death! Yet I will trust in him though he slay me."

Mr. G. W. Ratliff, Chairman of the Relief Committee, Buchanan, Neb., writes: "A great many are suffering here. These people need provisions, flour, meat, potatoes, beans, meal—or anything to eat, corn or wheat feed of any kind, and clothing of all sorts—shoes and stockings the worst."

Mr. H. H. Rink, evangelist, writing from Jetmore, Kan., writes: "There are twenty-eight counties in this part of Kansas as bad as or worse off than our own. Philanthropic giving seems the only solution; then if it pleases the Lord to add his increase blessing to the farmers' efforts, through previous arrangement a proper return can be made for the use of the seed, and the returns used in helping other needy ones."

A PRIMER OF MUSIC

By Wm. Mason, Mus. Doc. and W. S. B. Mathews.

This work covers entirely new ground. It is not alone a Primer of the Pianoforte, with information about the Keyboard Notations and peculiarities of the instrument, but much more. It is a Primer of Musicianship,

having in it the foundations of Harmony, Musical Form, Principle of Phrasing, the correct way of playing all the embellishments and ornaments, the

and other interesting and mind-awakening instruction. While intended for the use of young pupils, the ground it covers is so much more extensive than that usually covered by elementary piano lessons, that pupils as far along as the fourth and fifth grades will find here much matter which they have previously neglected.

THE BOOK SHELF

BACK UNTO BETHEL.*

BACK unto Bethel, it is well to wander,
Where the fresh beauty of our morning lies,
Where the glad sunlight of the spirit's dawning
First woke to radiance the soul's dark skies;
And drops more grateful than the dews of Hermon.
Or those that gathered upon Zion's mounts,
Poured, in their crystal and anointing clearness
From life's pure founts.

Back unto Bethel when our way is darkened,
And thro' the shadow we can find no light,
Our guidance lost and thickly round us closing
Doubt's misty circle, and despair's black night;
If hitherward our fearful steps are turning,
Perchance the cloud may glow with rainbow dyes,
And we behold the ladder of the angels
To Heaven rise.

Back unto Bethel when our feet are straying
Far from the pathway leading unto peace,
When cumbering care has been our steps delaying,
And earthly pleasures yielded their increase,
Let us return and mourn the promise broken,
Bind up the covenant, renew our vow,
And he who stands the same forgiving Saviour
May meet us now.

A CHURCH FAIR'S SEQUEL.†

IN spite of the fatigues and excitements of the fair, the Limber family assembled in full force at the breakfast-table next morning. Mrs. Limber and Bessie were unusually quiet, and their appetites were evidently below the ordinary standard. Sam was in unabated spirits, and Mr. Limber, according to his wont, serenely cheerful.

The door-bell rang.

"That," said Mrs. Limber, "is the man from Delf's. He was to come early this morning to take away the extra china."

The man from Delf's proved to be a boy from somewhere else.

It was plain enough that the place he had come out of was a lawyer's office. He had in his hands a big bundle of papers, unmistakably legal, tied with red tape, and arranged with evident precision; and he was equipped with a memorandum-book and a pencil. He was a chunky boy, rubicund of hair and face, somewhat belligerent in his general aspect, and looked as though he might have been, as perhaps he was, the lineal descendant of several generations of deputy sheriffs. A view of his side-pocket disclosed the fact that he had been engaged in eating a large apple, upon which he had temporarily stayed proceedings in order to attend to the business in hand.

"David Limber, Martha Limber, Samuel Limber, Bessie Limber," said the boy, as if he were calling the roll of the entire family, "I have got summonses and complaints for all of you," and he evidently knew by sight the respective persons whose names he had pronounced, for he proceeded, in the most deliberate manner to draw certain papers from his bundle and to deliver one to Mr. Limber and another to Sam, who was seated at his father's left hand. He then crossed, as formally as though he were following a stage direction, to Mr. Limber's right, and, after a deliberate survey of Bessie, thrust a third paper at her, which he put into her hand without any co-operation on her part, very much as packages of prize-candy and other light wares are devolved on unwilling recipients in railway cars.

"I would like to know," said the aggressive boy, as the paper fell on Bessie's lap, "whether you are a minor, under the age of fourteen years?"

"What an impudent boy!" said Bessie, turning to her mother.

"Oh, very well; if you decline to answer, I will make sure, and serve a copy on your father, mother, or guardian. I've got plenty of them."

"Oh, I am over fourteen—seventeen last March," cried Bessie, fearing lest she had involved the family in some new trouble by not telling the whole truth instantly, and yet entirely unable to comprehend the behavior of her strange interlocutor.

"It is a suit at law," said Sam; "the overseers of the poor of the town of Spindle have sued papa and mamma in Justice Hazey's court for three hundred and ten dollars. Just hear this, will you—it is all printed: it says that the defendants—that's papa and mamma—'did, heretofore, on the fifteenth day of December in this present year'—that's short for yesterday, you see—'at the village of Spindle, in the town of Spindle, set up and propose a certain chattel, to wit'—oh, do listen to this!—'an image or effigy of the female, human form, composed, as to the head and neck thereof, of wax, and as to the rest, residue, and remainder thereof, of muslin stuffed with bran, sawdust, or otner minute particles'—there's a legal description of a doll for you—'to be raffled for to certain persons who then aud there respectively paid or contracted to pay, the sum of one dollar for the chance of obtaining the same, there being in all one hundred chances, and the value of the said chattel so set up being then and there one hundred dollars'—that's a whopper," said Sam—"'contrary to the provisions of the Revised Statutes of this State; wherefore, the said plaintiffs'—that's the overseers of the poor," added Sam—"'demand judgment against the said defendents'—that's papa and mamma, you know—'for the sum of three hundred dollars, being three times the value of the article so set up'—I should think it was—'together with the further sum of ten dollars, making in all three hundred and ten dollars and the costs of this action'—hollao! Richard Folio, plaintiff's attorney.'"

"So, Dick Folio is at the bottom of all this," said Mrs. Limber. "How utterly contemptible!—Of course, husband, you will take no notice of it."

"Really," said Mr. Limber, "it looks like his having us arrested."

"And to think," continued Mrs. Limber, "that this same Richard Folio was once a boy in my Sunday School class, when he was no bigger than our Davy. Of course, he can never, never, cross the threshold of this house again."

"It is thirteen hundred and ten dollars all told," said Sam, still absorbed in the legal documents on which he was making marginal notes and calculations; "and costs besides in one hundred and one suits. Now costs are something that you can't calculate. There is no telling what they may run up to."

"Thirteen hundred and ten dollars," said Bessie despairingly, "is more than the whole profits of the fair."

"What on earth have the overseers of the poor got to do with all this?" demand Mrs. Limber; "do they oversee everybody, and do you suppose that Dick Folio has any right to bring them into his impudent schemes?"

"I believe," said Mr. Limber, "by the law anyone who sets up a thing at a raffle is liable to pay a penalty to the overseers of the poor of three time its value and ten dollars besides, just as Sam has read from the paper, and everyone who takes a chance in a raffle is liable to pay a penalty of ten dollars."

"What an infamous law!" said Mrs. Limber, "and then to start it up and set it agoing, between night and morning, against respectable people like us, while thieves, and drunkards, and murderers, and burglars, go scot-free! Who in the world would ever suspect that there were any such penalties kept concealed like traps to be sprung upon honest people in their own houses, and at the breakfast-table, and by boys, too?"

"My dear," said Mr. Limber, "everyone is supposed to know the law, and I told you long ago that I believed the raffle was against the law, and I warned you to take care, but you went on, and now it appears that the law is going to be enforced against us. Respectable people are just as good defendants as thieves or drunkards, and at all events those who dance must pay the piper. That's good law."

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mighty but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. A GREAT MISSION FOUNDER.

Rev. Sheldon Jackson, Pioneer Christian Worker in Many Lands—He carried the Gospel to the Eskimo and Founded the Alaska Mission—A Glorious Record.

WORLDLY fame places its laurel upon the brows of the explorer, the scientist and the geographer, who, by their brilliant genius and daring, add to the sum of human knowledge. But a more enviable reward comes to him who, in the performance of his high mission as a servant of the Master, carries the Gospel of Jesus to the remote parts of the earth, holding his own life as a very little thing, if he but win souls from the darkness of ignorance and superstition, into the blessed light of divine truth. As Christianity advances, the work of such men as Carey, Brainerd, Livingston and other Gospel pioneers looms up with a greater significance. Science changes and the work accomplished by explorers and historiographers is obscured by later rivals; but divine truth is eternal and immutable and the seed sown by Gospel pioneers, in whatever land, bears fruit perennially.

REV. SHELDON JACKSON.

From time to time, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has presented, for the instruction and encouragement of its readers, sketches of the lives of modern missionary pioneer workers in all parts of the globe. Some toiled for souls in the heat of a tropical sun in India or Africa, others among the wild tribes of Asia or the nomads of Syria or Arabia, and still others among the mixed races of South America or the people of Mexico. The typical mission career outlined below has had for its field of operations a territory extending almost from the equator to the Arctic zone, and is one that abounds in interest and momentous results.

Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D. D., has for thirty-seven years been one of the most prominent pioneer ministers of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. Born at Minaville, N. Y., in 1834, he graduated at Union College in 1855, and Princeton Theological Seminary in 1858. Ordained to the ministry by the Presbytery of Albany, May 5, 1858, he, with his wife, went as missionary of the Foreign Board to the Indian Territory on the frontier of Texas. His health failed in that malarious climate, and he became a Home Missionary for Western Wisconsin and Southern Minnesota, from 1859 to 1864, with headquarters at La Crescent, Minn. He afterward had general charge of the mission work in Southern Minnesota, and later was appointed Superintendent of Missions for Northern and Western Iowa, Dakota, Nebraska, and "the regions beyond," comprising one-fourth of the United States. In 1870 he received a commission from the Board of Domestic Missions, as Superintendent of Missions for the Rocky Mountain Territories, and removed to Denver, Colo., taking charge of the vast and then almost unknown region of country along the Rocky Mountains, from British America to Old Mexico, and covered by the territories of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona and Utah. He remained in this work until January, 1882, when he spent a short time in the East. Dr. Jackson's field of work being among the exceptional populations of the country, he became the originator and one of the chief promoters of the "Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions." He organized the first Presbyterian missions or churches in the Territories of Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Utah, Arizona and Alaska, and he founded the Alaska Mission. He assisted in the organization of the Synods of St. Paul in 1860, and Colorado in 1871, of the Presbyteries of Chippewa in 1859, Southern Minnesota in 1865, Colorado 1870, Wyoming 1871, Montana 1872, and Utah 1874; having previously organized the majority of the churches composing several Presbyteries. Over one hundred prosperous churches owe their existence to this one man's consecrated labors.

AN ALASKAN INDIAN CANOE CONVEYING MISSIONARIES.

When Dr. Jackson first went to Alaska, it was an unorganized section, without law or government. Recognizing the need of goverment protection for the infant missions, he pressed the matter upon the attention of Congress until, in the spring of 1884, a bill was passed giving both a government and a common school system to Alaska. In the spring of 1885, he was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, "United States General Agent of Education in Alaska." As the representative of the government he sought and secured the establishment of mission schools in Alaska by the mission societies of the Moravian, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist, Swedish Evangelical and Friends' Churches.

In 1887, he commenced the publication at Sitka, Alaska, of "The North Star," a monthly paper in the interest of schools and missions.

In 1890, finding that the Eskimo of Arctic Alaska were being gradually reduced to starvation by the steady destruction of the whale and walrus, he devised and set in operation a scheme for introducing the tame reindeer of Siberia into that country, as a new and permanent source of food supply. In 1891, he brought to Alaska sixteen reindeer, which were turned loose on an island in Unalaska harbor. The following year he established the first herd of tame reindeer on the shores of America. The station selected was Port Clarence, near Bering

"TOMB AND TEMPLE."

Text: Esther 1 : 1, "From India even unto Ethiopia."

IN all the Bible this is the only book in which the word India occurs, but it stands for a realm of vast interest in the time of Esther as in our time. It yielded then as now spices, and silks, and cotton, and rice, and indigo, and ores of all richness, and precious stones of all sparkle, and had a civilization of its own as marked as Egyptian or Grecian or Roman civilization. It holds the costliest tomb ever built, and the most unique and wonderful idolatrous temple ever opened. For practical lessons, in this my sixth discourse in "'Round-the-world" series, I show you that tomb and temple of India.

In a journey around the world it may not be easy to tell the exact point which divides the pilgrimage into halves. But there was one structure toward which we were all the time traveling, and having seen that, we felt that if we saw nothing more, our expedition would be a success. That one object was the Taj Mahal of India. It is the crown of the whole earth. The spirits of architecture met to enthrone a king, and the spirit of the Parthenon of Athens was there; and the spirit of St. Sophia of Constantinople was there: and the spirit of St. Izaak of St. Petersburg was there; and the spirit of the Baptistery of Pisa was there; and the spirits of the Great Pyramid, and of Luxor Obelisk, and of the Porcelain Tower of Nankin, and of St. Mark's of Venice; and the spirits of all the great towers, great cathedrals, great mausoleums, great sarcophagi, great capitols for the living, and of great necropolises for the dead, were there. And the presiding genius of the throng with gavel of Parian marble smote the table of Russian malachite, and called the throng of spirits to order, and called for a vote as to which spirit should wear the chief crown, and mount the chief throne, and wave the chief sceptre, and by unanimous acclaim the cry was: "Long live the spirit of the Taj, king of all the spirits of architecture! Thine is the Taj Mahal of India!"

The building is about six miles from Agra, and as we rode out in the early dawn we heard nothing but the hoofs and wheels that pulled and turned us along the road, at every yard of which our expectation rose until we had some thought that we might be disappointed at the first glimpse, as some say they were disappointed. But how can any one be disappointed with the Taj is almost as great a wonder to me as the Taj itself. There are some people always disappointed, and who knows but that having entered heaven they may criticise the architecture of the Temple, and the cut of the white robes, and say that the River of Life is not quite up to their expectations, and that the white horses on which the conquerors ride seem a little spring-halt or spavined?

My son said, "There it is!" I said, "Where?" For that which he saw to be the building seemed to me to be more like the morning cloud blushing under the stare of the rising sun. It seemed not so much built up from earth as let down from heaven. Fortunately, you stop at an elaborated gate-way of red sandstone one-eighth of a mile from the Taj, an entrance so high, so arched, so graceful, so four-domed, so painted, and chiseled, and scrolled that you come very gradually upon the Taj, which structure is enough to intoxicate the eye, and stun the imagination, and entrance the soul. We go up the winding stairs of this majestic entrance of the gate-way, and buy a few pictures and examine a few curios, and from it look off upon the Taj, and descend to the pavement of the garden that raptures everything between the gate-way and the ecstasy of marble and precious stones. You pass along a deep stream of water in which all manner of brilliant fins swirl and float. There are eighty-four fountains that spout, and bend, and arch themselves to fall in showers of pearl in basins of snowy whiteness. Beds of all imaginable flora greet the nostril before they do the eye, and seem to roll in waves of color as you advance towards the vision you are soon to have of what human genius did when it did its best; moon-flowers, lilacs, marigolds, tulips, and almost everywhere the lotus; thickets of bewildering bloom: on either side trees from many lands bend their arborescence over your head, or seem with convoluted branches to reach out their arms towards you in welcome. On and on you go amid tamarind, and cypress, and poplar, and oleander, and yew, and sycamore, and banyan, and palm, and trees of such novel branch, and leaf, and girth, you cease to ask their name or nativity. As you approach the door of the Taj one experiences a strange sensation of awe, and tenderness, and humility, and worship. The building is only a grave, but what a grave! Built for a queen, who, according to some was very good, and according to others was very bad. I choose to think she was very good. At any rate, it makes me feel better to think that this commemorative pile was set up for the immortalization of virtue rather than vice. The Taj is a mountain of white marble, but never such walls faced each other with exquisiteness; never such a tomb was cut from block of alabaster; never such a congregation of precious stones brightened, and gloomed, and blazed, and chastened, and glorified a building since sculptor's chisel cut its first curve, or painter's pencil traced its first figure, or mason's plumb-line measured its first wall, or architect's compass swept its first circle.

The Taj has sixteen great arched windows, four at each corner. Also at each of the four corners of the Taj stands a minaret 137 feet high. Also at each side of this building is a splendid mosque of red sandstone. Two hundred and fifty years has the Taj stood, and yet not a wall is cracked, nor a mosaic loosened, nor an arch sagged, nor a panel dulled. The storms of 250 winters have not marred, nor the heats of 250 summers disintegrated a marble. There is no story of age written by mosses on its white surface. Montaz, the queen, was beautiful, and Shah Jehan, the king, here proposed to let all the centuries of time know it. She was married at twenty years of age and died at twenty-nine. Her life ended as another life began; as the rose bloomed the rose-bush perished. To adorn this dormitory of the dead, at the command of the king, Bagdad sent to this building its cornelian, and Ceylon its lapis lazuli, and Punjab its jasper, and Persia its amethyst, and Thibet its turquoise, and Lanka its sapphire, and Yemen its agate, and Punah its diamonds; and blood-stones, and sardonyx, and chalcedony, and moss agates are as common as though they were pebbles. You find one spray of vine beset with eighty, and another with one hundred stones. Twenty thousand men were twenty years in building it, and although the labor was slave labor, and not paid for, the building cost what would be about $60,000,000 of our American money. Some of the jewels have been picked out of the wall by iconoclasts or conquerors, and substitutes of less value have taken their places; but the vines, the traceries, the arabesques, the spandrels, the entablatures are so wondrous that you feel like dating the rest of your life from the day you first saw them. In letters of black marble the whole of the Koran is spelled out in and on this august pile. The king sleeps in the tomb beside the queen, although he intended to build a palace as black as this was white on the opposite side of the river for himself to sleep in. Indeed, the foundation of such a necropolis of black marble is still there, and from the white to the black temple of the dead a bridge was to cross; but the son dethroned him and imprisoned him, and it is wonderful that the king had any place at all in which to be buried. Instead of windows to let in the light upon the two tombs, there is a trellis-work of marble, marble cut so delicately thin that the sun shines through it as easily as through glass. Look the world over and find so much translucency: canopies, traceries, lace-work, embroideries of stone.

THE "TAJ MAHAL" NEAR AGRA, INDIA.

We had heard of the wonderful resonance of this Taj, and so I tried it. I suppose there are more sleeping echoes in that building waiting to be wakened by the human voice than in any building ever constructed. I uttered one word, and there seemed descending invisible choirs in full chant, and there was a reverberation that kept on long after one would have expected it to cease, When a line of a hymn was sung there were replying, rolling, rising, falling, interweaving sounds that seemed modulated by beings seraphic. There were aerial sopranos and bassos, soft, high, deep, tremulous, emotional, commingling. It was like an antiphonal of heaven. But there are four or five Taj Mahals. It has one appearance at sunrise, another at noon, another an sunset, and another by moonlight. Indeed, the silver trowel of the moon, and the golden trowel of the sunlight, and the leaden trowel of the storm build and rebuild the glory, so that it never seems twice alike. It has all moods, all complexions, all grandeurs. From the top of the Taj, which is 250 feet high, springs a spire thirty feet higher, and that is enamelled gold. What an anthem in eternal rhythm! Lyrics and elegies in marble. Sculptured hosanna! Masonry as of supernatural hands! Mighty doxology in stone! I shall see nothing to equal it till I see the Great White Throne, and on it Him from whose face the earth and heavens flee away.

The Taj is the pride of India, and especially of Mohammedanism. An English officer at the fortress told us that when during the general mutiny in 1857 the Mohammedans proposed insurrection at Agra, the English government aimed the guns of the fort at the Taj and said, "You make insurrection, and that same day we will blow your Taj to atoms;" and that threat ended the disposition for mutiny at Agra.

But I thought while looking at that palace for the dead, all this constructed to covcover a handful of dust, but even that handful has probably gone from the mausoleum. How much better it would have been to expend sixty millions of dollars which the Taj Mahal cost, for the living. What asylums it might have built for the sick, what houses for the homeless! What improvement our century has made upon other centuries in lifting in honor of the desparted memorial churches, memorial hospitals, memorial reading-rooms, memorial observatories. By all possible means let us keep the memory of departed loved ones fresh in mind, and let there be an appropriate head-stone or monument in the cemetery, but there is a dividing line between reasonable commemoration, and wicked extravagance. The Taj Mahal has its uses as an architectural achievement, eclipsing all other architecture but as a memorial of a departed wife and mother it expresses no more than the plainest slab in many a country graveyard. The best monument we can any of us have built for us when we are gone is in the memory of those whose sorrows we have alleviated, in the wounds we have healed, in the kindnesses we have done, in the ignorance we have enlightened, in the recreant we have reclaimed, in the souls we have saved! Such a monument is built out of material more lasting than marble or bronze, and will stand amid the eternal splendors long after the Taj Mahal of India shall have gone down in the ruins of a world of which it was the costliest adornment. But I promised to show you not only a tomb of India, but a unique heathen temple, and it is a temple underground.

With miner's candle we had seen something of the underside of Australia, as at Gimpie; and with guide's torch we had seen at different times something of the underside of America, as in Mammoth Cave; but we are now to enter one of the sacred cellars of India, commonly called the Elephanta Caves. We had it all to ourselves, the steam yacht that was to take us about fifteen miles over the harbor of Bombay, and between enchanted islands, and along shores whose curves, and gulches, and pictured rocks gradually prepared the mind for appreciation of the most unique spectacle in India. The morning had been full of thunder, and lightning, and deluge, but the atmospheric agitations had ceased, and the cloudy ruins of the storm were piled up in the heavens, huge enough and darkly purple enough to make the skies as grandly picturesque as the earthly scenery amid which we moved. After an hour's cutting through the waters we came to the long pier reaching from the island called Elephanta. It is an island small of girth, but 600 feet high. It declines into the marshes of man grove. But the whole island is one tangle of foliage and verdure; convolvulus creeping the ground; mosses climbing the rocks; vines sleeving the long arms of the trees; red flowers here and there in the woods, like incendiary's torch trying to set the groves on fire; cactus and acacia vying as to which can most charm the beholder; tropical bird meeting parti-colored butterfly in jungles planted the same summer the world was born. We stepped out of the boat amid enough natives to afford all the help we needed for landing and guidance. You can be carried by coolies in an easy chair, or you can walk, if you are blessed with two stout limbs, which the Psalmist evidently lacked, or he would not have so depreciated them, when he said: "The Lord taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man." We passed up some stone steps, and between the walls we saw awaiting us a cobra, one of those snakes which greet the traveller oft times in India. Two of the guides left the cobra dead by the wayside. They must have been Mohammedans, for Hindoos never kill that sacred reptile.

And now we come near the famous temple hewn from one rock of porphyry at least eight hundred years ago. On either side of the chief temple is a chapel, these cut out of the same stone. So vast was the undertaking, and to the Hindoo was so great the human impossibility that they say the gods scooped out this structure from the rock, and carved the pillars, and hewed its shape into gigantic idols, and dedicated it to all the grandeurs. We climb many stone steps before we get to the gateways. The entrance to this Temple has sculptured doorkeepers leaning on sculptured devils. How strange! But I have seen doorkeepers of churches and auditoriums who seemed to be leaning on the demons of bad ventilation and asphyxia. Doorkeepers ought to be leaning on the angels of health, and comfort, and life. All the sextons and janitors of the earth who have spoiled sermons and lectures, and poisoned the lungs of audiences by inefficiency ought to visit this Cave of Elephanta and beware of what these doorkeepers are doing, when instead of leaning on the angelic, they lean on the demoniac.

In these Elephanta Caves everything is on a Samsonian and Titanian scale. With chisels that were dropped from nerveless hands at least eight centuries ago, the forms of the gods Brahma, and Vishnu, and Siva were cut into the everlasting rock. Siva is here represented by a figure sixteen feet nine inches high, one-half man and one-half woman. Run a line from the centre of the forehead straight to the floor of the rock, and you divide this idol into masculine and feminine. Admired as this idol is by many, it was to me about the worst thing that was ever cut into porphyry, perhaps because there is hardly anything on earth so objectionable as a being half man and half woman. Do be one or other, my hearer. Man is admirable, and woman is admirable, but either in flesh or trap rock a compromise of the two is hideous. Save us from effeminate men and masculine women!

Yonder is the King Ravana worshipping. Yonder is the sculptured representation of the marriage of Shiva and Parhati. Yonder is Daksha, the son of Brahma, born from the thumb of his right hand. He had sixty daughters. Seventeen of those daughters were married to Kasyapa and became the mothers of the human race. Yonder is a god with three heads. The centre god has a crown wound with necklaces of skulls. The right hand god is in a paroxysm of rage, with forehead of snakes, and in its hand is a cobra. The left hand god has pleasure in all its features and the hand has a flower. But there are gods and goddesses in all directions. The chief temple of this rock is one hundred and thirty feet square and has twenty-six pillars rising to the roof. After the conquerors of other lands, and the tourists from all lands have chipped, and defaced, and blasted, and carried away curios and mementos for museums and homes, there are enough entrancements left to detain one, unless he is cautious, until he is down with some of the malarias which encompass this island, or get bitten with some of its snakes. Yes, I felt the chilly dampness of the place, and left this congress of gods, this pandemonium of demons, this pantheon of indifferent deities, and came to the steps and looked off upon the waters which rolled and flashed, around the steam yacht, that was waiting to return with us to Bombay. As we stepped aboard, our minds filled with the idols of the Elephanta Caves, I was impressed as never before with the thought that man must have a religion of some kind, even if he has to contrive one himself, and he must have a god, even though he make it with his own hand. I rejoice to know the day will come when the one God of the Universe will be acknowledged throughout India.

That evening of our return to Bombay I visited the Young Men's Christian Association with the same appointments that you find in the Young Men's Christian Associations of Europe and America, and the night after that I addressed a throng of native children who are in the schools of the Christian Missions. Christian universities gather under their wing of benediction a host of the young men of this country. Bombay and Calcutta, the two great commercial cities of India, feel the elevating power of an aggressive Christianity. Episcopalian liturgy and Presbyterian Westminster Catechism, and Methodist Anxious-seat, and Baptist Waters of Consecration now stand where once basest idolatries had undisputed sway. The work which shoemaker Carey inaugurated at Serampore, India, translating the Bible into forty different dialects, and leaving his worn-out body amid the natives whom he had come to save, and going up into the heavens from which he can better watch all the field—that work will be completed in the salvation of the millions of India: and beside him gazing from the same high places stand Bishop Heber, and Alexander Duff, and John Scudder, and Mackay, who fell at Delhi, and Moncrieff, who fell at Cawnpore, and Polehampton, who fell at Lucknow, and Freeman, who fell at Futtyghur, and all heroes and heroines who, for Christ's sake, lived and died for the Christianization of India: and their heaven will not be complete until the Ganges that washes the Ghats of heathen temples shall roll between churches of the living God and the trampled womanhood of Hindooism shall have all the rights purchased by Him who amid the cuts and stabs of his own assassination cried out: "Behold thy mother!" and from Bengal Bay to Arabian Ocean, and from the Himalayas to the coast of Coromandel there be lifted hosannas to Him who died to redeem all nations. In that day Elephanta Cave will be one of the places where idols are "cast to the moles and bats." If any clergyman asks me, as an unbelieving minister of religion once asked the Duke of Wellington, "Do you not think that the work of converting the Hindoos is all a practical farce?" I answer him as Wellington answered the unbelieving minister: "Look to your marching orders, sir!" Or if any one having joined in the Gospel attack feels like retreating, I say to him, as General Havelock said to a retreating regiment, "The enemy are in front, not in the rear," and leading them again into the fight, though two horses had been shot under him.

Indeed, the taking of this world for Christ will be no holiday celebration, but as tremendous as when in India during the mutiny of 1857, a fortress manned by Sepoys was to be captured by Sir Colin Campbell and the army of Britain. The Sepoys hurled upon the attacking columns burning missiles, and grenades, and fired on them shot and shell, and poured on them from the ramparts burning oil, until, a writer who witnessed it says, "It was a picture of Pandemonium." Then Sir Colin addressed his troops, saying, "Remember the women and children must be rescued!" and his men replied: "Ay! Ay! Sir Colin! We stood by you at Balaklava, and will stand by you here!" And then came the triumphant assault of the battlements. So in this Gospel campaign which proposes capturing the very last citadel of idolatry and sin, and hoisting over it the banner of the Cross, we may have hurled upon us mighty opposition, and scorn, and obloquy, and many may fall before the work is done, yet at every call for new onset, let the cry of the church be "Ay! ay! Great Captain of our salvation; we stood by thee in other conflicts, and we will stand by thee to the last!" And then, if not in this world, then from the battlements of the next, as the last Appolyonic fortification shall crash into ruin, we will join in the shout: "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory!" "Hallelujah! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

Straits, and the herd numbered one hundred and seventy-five. In 1894 the herd numbered seven hundred. In the spring of that year, in order to secure the very best instructors to teach the Eskimo the care and management of tame reindeer, Dr. Jackson sent an agent to Lapland and brought over six families of Lapps. This was the first colony of that people ever brought to the United States.

In the prosecution of his work Dr. Jackson has travelled from 1869 to 1894, an aggregate of six hundred and five thousand and twenty-seven miles, or an average of twenty-three thousand two hundred and seventy miles a year. Much of this traveling was by stage coach, and some of it on mule-back or on foot, over the dangerous trails of the mountains. Several trips involved each 1,500 miles of staging through a desolate and wild Indian country; twice he went by stage across the plains and over the mountains, to the Pacific; twice he made trips of 2,000 miles each, by stage and horse-back, and twice, dangerous canoe-trips of several hundred miles, along the Alaskan coast, with wild Indians for his companions. Five trips were made north of the Arctic Circle among the eternal ice-fields off the northern coasts of Alaska and Siberia. To ride in the stage coach day and night, from early Monday to late on Saturday, without stopping, except for meals, was not an uncommon experience. To make a new way in the wilderness, ford rivers, climb mountains, cross the track of the avalanche and the trail of the murderous Indian; to be gaunt with hunger or parched with thirst; to blister under the semi-tropical sun of Arizona, or shiver amid polar ice-floes; to sleep upon the ground, without shelter, exposed to the poisonous reptiles of the South; or dig a bed in the snow of the high mountains, or toss in a canoe on the waves of the North Pacific, have been the necessary vicissitudes of his work.

Thrice the news despatches in the daily press have announced his death, reporting once that he was drowned while making a preaching tour in a canoe: once that he was killed by the Indians and again that he was wrecked in the Alaskan Archipelago.

Dr. Jackson's wide experience, his fervid zeal, and his practical pungency, make him a very effective platform speaker, and he has frequently visited the East, to arouse the Church on the subject of missions. From 1869 to 1894 he delivered over twenty-nine hundred mission addresses. The result of his work in Alaska alone is a splendid monument to Christian devotion and courage. His is a life that has been full of spiritual triumphs on the face of seemingly insurmountable obstacles and his labors have been blessed in the gathering of multitudes to the kingdom. He is, in the highest and most spiritual sense, a true pioneer and the father and founder of Christian missions in Alaska and the outlying regions of the North.

CHRIST THE BREAD OF LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 20. John 6: 23-35. Golden Text John 6: 31. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE immediate effect of the feeding of the multitude was to convince the multitude that "this is of a truth the Prophet that cometh into the world." (verse 14, R.V.) But they had their own ideas of the mission of that prophet for whom they were looking. Like their forefathers, they wanted a king that they might be like all the nations; a king who might judge them, and go out before them, and fight their battles. (1.Sam. 7: 20.) They wanted Christ to minister to their political pride and ambition, to "set them on high above all the nations of the earth" (Deut. 28: 1), without their fulfilling the conditions attached to this promise: "If thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments." Without a word of reproach, without seeking to convince them of their mistake, without saying at the time what he could say later on to Herod when his hour was come to state this great fact: "My kingdom is not of this world," or age, he silently left them. But Jesus could not serve their purpose, and "go out before them;" Jesus therefore perceiving that they were about to come and take him by force to make him a king, withdrew again into a mountain himself alone. He could not go out before them; He did always those things that pleased God. (John 14: 29.)

Oh, the patience of our Lord! He could always wait, and therefore nothing premature or unripe ever fell from his lips. Impatience and unbelief are closely allied. "He that believeth shall not make haste." He had a lesson to teach his disciples; He had constrained them to take a boat and go before him across the lake of Gennesaret while he had sent the multitudes away, and in the storm on the lake, he put to the proof how far they had understood all he had meant to teach them by the miracle of the loaves. But when in their terror and distress in the storm on the lake he came to them on the water and calmed the storm, they were sore amazed in themselves; for they understood not concerning the loaves, for their heart was hardened; and he needed, on another occasion, to reproach them sharply for letting this manifestation of his power go by without turning it to account in a deepened knowledge of God, and deeper understanding of the ministry of their Master.

But while he was always on the watch to teach his own chosen twelve he did not forget the needs of the multitude. Impressed by the miracle of the loaves, and finding that neither Jesus nor his disciples remained on the Gadara side of the lake, they took boats, and crossed the lake to seek him, and on reaching the spot where he was "they said unto him: Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" There were questions put to Jesus which he never answered. It was no concern of theirs when he crossed the lake, but there was a matter of deep importance to him: it was which led them to seek him. Thus, in answer to their question, he says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you: "Ye seek me, not because ye saw the signs, but because ye ate the loaves and were filled. Work not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you, for him the Father, even God, hath sealed." Words utterly incomprehensible to them at the moment, yet sown for the time when the Spirit of God should quicken them. Because they had seen his signs they had followed him to the mountain; because they ate of the loaves they followed him over the sea. But the temporal benefit in the way of supply had failed to produce in them the conviction that he was the Messiah or to produce any change of heart which could turn them from their self-life to a life of real conformity to the will of God.

"Meat which abideth unto eternal life" was to them an idea beyond their grasp; they lived, like the heathen nations around them, in things seen and temporal, and eternity and eternal things were a region unknown to them. Their occupation and concern was: "What shall we eat, what shall we drink; wherewithal shall we be clothed?" of which Jesus says: "After all these things do the Gentiles (the heathen of the days), seek; for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." (Matt. 6: 31, 32.) Children of forefathers which had been fed in the wilderness by bread from heaven, they yet shared the anxiety of the heathen who knew not God as their Father, and thus they justified the heathen in their unbelief. Set in the midst of nations as witnesses that God is God, they had as a people signally failed him.

They manifested some desire after God in their question: "What must we do that we may work the works of God?" (R.V.) still with a material end in view; still occupied with the temporal benefit of the miracle of the loaves. The answer of Jesus brought other considerations before them: "This is the work of God that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." But oh, the blindness of those who have not a single eye, whose heart goeth after their covetousness! they ask the question: "What then doest thou for a sign, that we may see and believe thee?" Oh the patience of Jesus! Only one day had elapsed since five thousand of their men, besides women and children, had been fed to the full with five little loaves and two small fishes, distributed by the mighty hand of him who multiplied them; and now, just as though no snch miracle had happened, the very men who had eaten the loaves say: What sign shewest thou then that we may see and believe thee? What dost thou work? (ver. 30). It is an awful hardness of heart in a sinner to pass over an unprecedented intervention of God as though it were a common thing. Tyre and Sidon, wicked as they had been, were righteous in the eyes of God when compared with Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, the cities where so many of Christ's mighty works were done, because they repented not when God spoke to them through his Son; their spirit did not fail before him; they did not recognize who it was that drew near to them; their eyes, blinded with self-interest, had lost the focus which made eternal things visible to them.

They had their Sign, and they still did not believe. Still thinking of the meat which perisheth, they continued: "Our fathers ate the manna in the wilderness; as it was written: He gave them bread out of heaven to eat. Jesus therefore said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, it was not Moses that gave you the bread out of heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread out of heaven. For the bread of God is that which cometh down out of heaven, and giveth life unto the world." Another life, eternal life, must have another bread, the bread of life; this was a mystery to them, and is and will be ever a mystery to those who are not partakers of eternal life. They were out of their depth now; alive to all temporal and material things, they little knew how much they were in need of that life from above which Adam lost when he fell. Yet seeing there was something to be gained, they knew not rightly what, and having tasted of the loaves, they imagined perhaps it was an unfailing supply of earthly good, they said: "Lord, evermore give us this bread."

When the Samaritan woman in her blindness and ignorance, made request of Christ for living water, he took her at her word, searched her sinful heart, put his finger on the sore place, the shameful history of her life, and said: "Go call thy husband and come thither." She recognized in whose presence she was: "Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet," and he was able to tell her that he was more, even the Messiah, the Christ of God. The request of these people of Gadara was of the same nature, but it did not bring about the same result. "Jesus said unto them, I am the Bread of Life; he that cometh to me shall not hunger and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." Here was the touchstone, to come to him and to believe in him. Many there are who accept benefits at the hand of God, and yet do not come to Jesus or believe in him, they will not have to do with himself but with his gifts only.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

DANGER was in the mood of the crowd who had been miraculously fed, as described in the preceding lesson. They felt that here truly was an extraordinary man. One who could feed them by superhuman power could surely do anything else. Perhaps this was the great king of whom their prophets had spoken. He ought to be a king. They would have him exert his power to set the nation again in its old position of independence and power. But that would have been a small thing for Jesus to do, compared with the plan he had conceived of a world-wide deliverance. Truly he would set the people free, but by the deliverance of the individual from sin. A republic with no foreign domination may be a nation of slaves if the people are dominated by their appetites and passions. A drunkard or an opium-eater is a slave, because he cannot let the drink or the drug alone if he wanted to. Christ perceived what the people had in mind. He would not yield to them, for he had met that temptation in the wilderness, and had overcome it. So he sent the people away and reinvigorated his soul by a night of prayer. Afterwards, about four in the morning, he crossed the lake after his disciples, coming on them when they were in the midst of one of those sudden storms which to this day are the dread of voyagers on the sea of Galilee. They were terrified at the sight of him at first, but when their fears were allayed, they welcomed him on board. It was not long after they had landed that the people came seeking Jesus. He was not deceived as to their motive. Their minds, he perceived, were set on material things. The true lesson of the miracle was that the man who had fed them must have come from God, and could therefore teach them heavenly truth. But they could not learn it. They wanted ease and prosperity. The sermon of the week's lesson was a reproof to them. The really important thing, Christ tells them, is the nurture and development of the soul. They should seek that above all, that they might live forever. The same lesson needs to be taught now. If people would use as much earnestness in seeking to be good as they use in seeking to be rich, they would be far happier, and better. This should be the chief aim. Christ describes the way. His hearers supposed they must do the works of God or good works. But not so; the only way was through him. He was the bread of God; in believing on him and following him they might have life.

This is the work of God, that ye believe on him. "Why do you stay with Marks?" one young man asked another, as they met in a restaurant at the lunch hour. "You could get a much better salary," he continued, "with our firm and with less work. You would have money to dress better and you would have time to go to the theatre occasionally instead of being kept late at night at your desk over those wretched stocks and bonds." The young man addressed looked shrewdly at his questioner as he said: "You are very kind, but I don't want to change. I know I could get twice the salary elsewhere, but it is not the salary I am concerned about. Mr. Marks is the best financier on the street. I believe in him and I am learning his methods. I shall be a rich man some day if I stay with him. I don't care for dress and the theatre, I am looking for something better." That was faith—faith in a man. Christ asks for faith in him assuring us that what he has to impart is the best of all gifts.

Evermore give us this bread. During the French Revolution, the National Assembly was debating a question as to the criminal laws with a long string of subjects to follow, affecting the right of suffrage and the procedure of the chambers, when the proceedings were violently interrupted. A great crowd of women broke into the chamber escorted by a number of armed men. There was great indignation at the interruption, as the members were in arrears with their work and were anxious to have the constitutional questions settled. "Nay, nay," cried a fish-woman, "stop that babble. That is not the question; the question is about bread." While thousands of the people of Paris were hungry there could be no question so important as that of providing for them. Everyone understands this need. People must have food if they are to live. Christ says that the need of the soul is like that of the body, and that he alone can supply it.

My Father giveth you the true bread. Christ's favorite name for God was Father, and he sought by many ways to get people to regard him as their Father and to think of him as loving them and providing for them as a father does for his children. They were apt to think of him as a great king afar off from them and that idea misrepresented God. Kings were often very indifferent to the needs of their people. Once when Rome was suffering from a famine, ships were sent to Egypt for corn. But Nero, in a freak of cruelty, countermanded the shipmasters' orders, and directed them to fill their vessels with sand for his arena. So when the hungry people heard the news that the ships were nearing port, they were elated with joy. Alas! how quickly their joy was turned to sorrow when they discovered that these vessels contained only sand, instead of corn. Sometimes when a person becomes anxious about his eternal welfare, an indiscreet friend bids him go into cheerful society, take some pleasure, have some amusement to relieve the anxiety. That is like giving sand instead of bread. Christ said that the true bread came from God.

Bread from Heaven. During the Crimean war in 1854, a clergyman in the south of France visited a camp where the soldiers were collected in readiness for embarkation for the Black Sea to take part in the siege of Sebastopol. Knowing that many of them would not live to return, he brought some testaments and distributed among them. Several years afterward he was traveling in a country district in France, and being one night in a village where there was no room for him in the inn, he asked where he could obtain a lodging. He was directed to the home of a widow, who, he was told, would be pleased to entertain him. He found the home clean and cheerful, but the widow herself was very dull and sorrowful. He made friends with her. She told him she had just lost her eldest son, who had been a soldier. The best son, she said, a mother ever had. He was not always so. As a boy he had been a great trouble to her, but since he came back from the war he had been her support and comfort. No one could be better, and he was as happy as the day was long. Even when he fell sick and knew he was going to die, he was happy. It all came from a book given to him before he went to the war. He used to read it every day and while he was sick he had it by him continually. He said he got more good from it than from food or medicine. The widow showed her guest the book and he at once recognized it as one of the Testaments he had given to the soldiers several years ago.

I am that Bread of Life. An eminent physician says that bread is the only kind of food on which a man could live exclusively without injury to his constitution. If a man were obliged to eat nothing but meat he would soon be sick and die. If he were to live on vegetables only, he would not thrive; he might eat nothing but bread and yet be strong and well. So Christ is sufficient for the happiness of those who love him. The richest men are often unhappy. The people who have most pleasure are often sick and weary of it. Kings and princes are generally envied because they have so much power and splendor, but many of them have left on record that their lives have been miserable. But a true Christian who has not found happiness in Christ has never existed. He may be poor, he may be despised, he may have any kind of trouble, but with Christ he is happy.

HELP FOR THE STRICKEN WEST.

Many Loving Hands now extended to Succor the Starving Kansas and Nebraska Farmers—The First $1,000 Forwarded by "The Christian Herald"—Contributions of Money and Clothing Pouring in—A Central Relief Depot Opened in New York.

RIGHT speedily have the Lord's people begun to respond to the appeal of the thousands of destitute families in the famine-stricken farming districts of Kansas and Nebraska. From every quarter, gifts of money and clothing are flowing in, accompanied by letters that breathe the pure spirit of Christian benevolence and kindly sympathy. Up to the present time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has expended from the Fund $1.000 for the relief of a number of families in Kansas and Nebraska, and to some in Oklahoma, South Dakota and Texas, checks having been forwarded by mail to reliable distributors in one hundred and ninety-eight districts in the sections where the suffering is the sharpest. A "Central Relief Depot" has been opened at 740–742 Broadway, New York City, for the reception of contributions of clothing, &c., and all who desire to render aid in that form can send their gifts to that depot by express, from which point they will be shipped direct to their destination in the West. This will be a considerable convenience to contributors relieving them from the expense of transportation West. Express charges on all boxes and packages forwarded to the Central Relief Depot need be prepaid to that point only, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD having arranged with the American Express Company for the transportation West, of all clothing supplies, etc., free of charge.

The Work of Distribution.

Some of the letters received from volunteer distributors during the past week show how faithfully and prayerfully their work is being performed among the needy ones. Rev. H. K. Bushnell, Sabbath School Missionary, Hastings, Neb., writes:

Your letter with the enclosure for the sufferers was received a week ago. In the same mail came a letter from the West, and it read somwhat in this fashion: "We are starving to death. I have been sick and am just able to sit up. We have two children, and are taking care of a little niece also, who is motherless. The men cannot get work and what shall we do?" Our neighbors are just as badly off, but they dislike to ask for alms, but I know that the Lord will provide, for I immediately sent them the five dollars. In the same mail were the request and the answer.

The people in the East have been kind in sending second-hand clothing, and it has been very acceptable, but the people here need food even more than they need clothing. I was in a man's house a few days ago whose family had had nothing but flour to live on for more than six weeks.

Mr. J. S. Dewey, Oakdale, Neb., writes:

In behalf of those who received the benefit of your contributions, many, many thanks. The destitution in this locality is much greater than during the grasshopper plague. Individuals, township and county are doing all in their power, but the wants are many and funds are few.

What one $5.00 Bill did.

Mrs. David E. Dodge, Almina, Kans., writes:

I received your letter containing $5.00 for the destitute and needy. I gave $2. to one family of seven; they only had a part of a sack of flour and did not know where the next sack was coming from, and they did not even have money enough to replace a broken lamp chimney. I gave $1. to a family of seven—three of the children had no shoes and they were very poorly clad. I gave $2. to a family of eight; they were very needy. The mother had no stockings. The fathers of these families would be glad to work if they could get the work. Their crops were a failure, and they have no means of support. I can distribute anything else you may send. Hoping, and praying that God may bless you in your efforts in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked.

Miss Minnie Matthew, Webster, Kan., gives this faithful detail of her stewardship:

I have been been busy with the $5 00 you sent me. I spent it as follows: 7 yards of calico for a girl's dress, 35 cents; five yards calico for a girl's dress, 25 cents; cap for a little boy, 40 cents; material for two hoods, 92 cents: material for a pair of pants, 60 cents; nine yards of calico for a dress, 63 cents; ten yards of calico for a dress, 70 cents; mittens, 20 cts; yarn for mittens, 20 cents; three pairs of stockings, 40 cents. I have given them to the very poorest.

"The Children! Oh, the Children!"

Mrs. Mary C. Taylor, Bird City, Kan., writes:

I received the $5.00 sent me through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I thank you a thousand times. I visited all the families in my section. One family which I helped consists of father, mother, and nine children. Their ages ranged from one year to fourteen. The mother told me that when she washed their clothes they had to go to bed. She washed the day I was there, without soap. The children! Oh, the children! and the mothers that are nursing babes! How they are suffering. I ask the blessing of God upon all those who are helping hand.

Mr. P. H. Day, Pearl, Neb., writes concerning his distributing work:

Finding the most pressing present demand to be bread, I laid out the whole amount in flour, and have disbursed the same where I found the wants most urgent. And in their behalf I earnestly thank those who aided in this contribution. There are many who shrink from so public a parading of their wants and will suffer great privation, before applying for aid, and to this class the flour has been given.

Sylvia Hutchinson, Mascot, Neb., another distributor, writes:

Yours enclosing $5.00 for the destitute here was duly received, and with it I bought $3.00 worth of flour at $1.50 per hundred; three pairs wool hose, 50c for the three. I keep account of all that is given out. I also received a box of groceries and one of clothing from Oakland, Neb., from the Ladies' Aid Society of that place. All, together, have helped the most urgent cases for a short time. Send us the added help of your prayers.

O. A. Buzzell, Juniata, Neb., another distributor, writes:

I esteem it a privilege to carry help into the stricken homes of the West. The field I have undertaken to canvas lies about 150 miles beyond my home, and back from the railroad, beyond the usual lines of missionary visits, and is not so well looked after. I sent to-day $2.00 (of your contribution) to a merchant, ordering flour and groceries delivered to two families—one, a man who is sick and will probably soon die, having a wife and five children all under fourteen years, very poor. The other a woman who is trying to support herself and two little girls. I found both of these families very destitute, when I was there ten days ago, and gave them some clothing. I shall look after them forthwith as means is supplied. The other $3.00 I shall use in similar ways. I find the people needing provision and fuel, and this need will be intensified as winter advances.

Aaron McKnight, Culbertson, Neb., gives this statement of the situation:

I received your check and have appropriated four dollars of it. There are many persons here who will need help before spring. The county funds are exhausted and dealers have refused to take any more county orders, and wait until taxes can be collected, for the people are too poor to pay their taxes.

Mr. H. C. Gane, Wilson, Kan., writes:

Your draft for the "drouth Sufferers" is a Godsend. I have used a part of it to meet some of the immediate needs of two quite destitute families and will, later on, report fully.

Editor. P. W. Scott of the "Chase County Enterprise," Imperial, Neb., writes:

It certainly was an opportune gift. A Mr. Harris just recently died, leaving a wife and several small children destitute. They were out of fuel and had nearly nothing to eat. I helped them, and Mrs. Harris sends you thanks. Our people are in hard circumstances, and anything you can do will be appreciated.

An Evangelist's Experience.

Mr. H. H. Rink, Evangelist, Jetmore, Kansas, another distributor, gives this picture from his own observation:

Your prompt attention is, I assure you, sincerely appreciated. I trust by your aid we will be able to materially help the people. We have the names of at least forty families, representing two hundred people living in Hodgeman County, who find themselves unable to purchase seed wheat and who, if they could secure the same, would sow it. This inability arises in almost every case from no fault of the parties involved. The more fortunate ones in the county have been, with but few exceptions, deprived the pleasure of keeping their neighbors owing to the losses they themselves have sustained. Indeed the helping hand extended by these already has made the number as small as it is at present. Children can help with their pennies as well as the older people with their dollars. Farmers who have the grain, but no money, can help. A few bushels contributed by each farmer more fortunate would do much to make up the quota needed. Contributions made outside the State of Kansas had best be made in form of money. There need be no fear of sending an over supply. There are twenty-eight counties in this part of Kansas as bad or worse off than our own. We hope to be able to help these five thousand people in similar straits.

Another faithful volunteer is Mrs. R. C. Bradley of Holdrege, Neb., who writes:

I used the money you sent to relieve the wants of a very needy family in the country, consisting of father, mother and five small children, in very destitute circumstances. To get work seems impossible. They need almost everything, but food and fuel seem to be the great need of many. I received a barrel of clothing to-day in answer to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S call for help, which I will endeavor to put where it will do good. Pray for us that the winds may be tempered.

They ask Aid "In Jesus' Name."

Letters of appeal, from residents of the afflicted states still continue to come by every mail in undiminished numbers. Mr. B. I. Hinman of North Platte, Neb., writes:

This (Lincoln) County is 48x54 miles in dimensions and probaby has more needy than any other county in the State, as we have met with a loss in the late total failure of crops in the years 1890, 1893 and 1894. We must expect much suffering this winter.

Mrs. O. H. Gordon, President of the Relief Society, Merna, Neb., writes that four barrels of clothing were received there and faithfully divided. The people have no money even to pay freight charges. Regarding the situation, she says:

It is just as bad as anywhere under the sun for hundreds of miles in Nebraska and western Kansas and Dakota. We can take back all we sent Russia thankfully and it will be none too much. We hope God will continue to restrain the cold waves, but if not, then hundreds must freeze to death, for there is no fuel, no money to buy any by most of the people on these bare prairies. I am doing all in my power at my own expense for the souls and bodies of the people, as a Nebraska missionary. If any one feels like helping me among the people these hard times, it will be thankfully received. If you give to help, give in Jesus' Name alone and for his cause.

Late telegraphic dispatches show that Mrs. Gordon's fears have been only too well founded. The recent snow storms have were very severe in Nebraska, and many persons are believed to have perished of cold. The situation in Buffalo, Boyd, Dawson, Keith, Lincoln, Perkins, Hitchcock, Chase, Hayes, Dundy, and Frontier counties is reported as appalling.

With his gift of $5, Mr. D. D. Davis, Bloomsburg, Pa., writes in this wholesouled Christian fashion:

This is to buy ten bushels of wheat to be distributed where wanted and needed. I have used it some years ago in New Jersey: dried it and ground it in the coffee mill; boiled it and made porridge of it, and was glad I had it, and liked it in my family. It is about the cheapest and best of nutrition. I pray God will see to the distribution and speedy relief of all sufferers.

Mrs. R. Cunningham, Woodson, writes:

The Ladies' Missionary Society of Unity Presbyterian Church of Woodson have just forwarded a box of clothing, valued at $55.00, to Nebraska. We saw in the columns of your paper the account of much suffering there.

Facing a Nebraska Winter.

Mrs. Wilson, President of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Brethren Church, Beaver City, Neb., says: "There is a great deal of help needed here, especially in the line of provisions. Of course, there are many that need clothing also."

E. S. Murphy, Litchfield, Neb., writes: "There is no point in the whole drought-stricken district, perhaps, that needs help more this. There was absolutely nothing made here the past season agriculturing, not even hay. 1893 was almost a complete failure, and the people to-day have nothing, only as it is shipped in from outside and there is no money to buy it when it comes and a Nebraska winter before us. Hundreds of horses and cattle must necessarily die before spring."

John H. Peter, Pleasanton, Neb., writes: "People here have not raised anything. What the people will do, I do not know. We have nothing to sell, and the merchants have come down on the credit, so you see the condition we are in. Any help sent, I assure you, will be thankfully received."

The record of distribution of the first $1,000 of the Fund is given below. Acknowledgments of all moneys contributed will be found on the next page.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
[illegible] House, New York City.

Next week, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish a complete Balance Sheet of all the Charity funds entrusted to its care during the year 1894. This would have appeared in the present issue, but our recently increased circulation compels us to close our forms for the present edition before New Year's Day.

COLD-HEARTED CHRISTIANS.

FRIGID Christians have sunk ten thousand young voyagers for heaven. One Christian who doubts will freeze the faith of fifty trying to believe. One arctic exhorter in a praying circle will send the meeting to the bottom of the sea. One man who does not know will discourage fifty men who do know. Alas! for the icebergs that float up and down church aisles, and up and down the streets, and up and down the social life. They do a thousandfold more damage than the one which staves in the bow of an ocean steamer. Such professors of religion broke loose from the region of eternal winter, and nothing but the warm gulf stream of God's mercy can melt them down. Meanwhile, stand clear of them. The warmest Christian cannot afford to come near such congealments. The temperature of your soul will immediately drop below zero.

All bigots are icebergs; beware of bigots. All formalists are icebergs; beware of formalists. All men who are trying to serve the world and serve God at the same time are icebergs; beware of all such compromisers. Be not deceived by the glittering pretentions of such persons. Nothing is more imposing than an iceberg; it towers up through the night in columnar and castellated grandeur; its pinnacles blaze in the daylight; it has galleries of crystal, and arches of crystal; and walls of crystal, and terraces of crystal, and corridors of crystal, and domes of crystal; but it is nothing but ice after all. The worst thing that can happen a ship is to run against an iceberg. The worst thing that can happen a young Christian is to get acquainted with a cold-hearted professor.

A PLEA FOR THE BIRDS.

WE plead for the whole kingdom of birds, either distinguished by gorgeous plumage or sweet cadence, the orioles, the grosbeaks, the robins, the quails, the meadow larks, the bluebirds, the cuckoos, the finches, the ptarmigans, the humming birds, the swallows, the kingfishers, the jays, the turtle doves, the starlings, that they are by the skyful being swept into the millinery establishment. The groves, the orchards, the forests of Amer[illegible] life. Seventy thousand birds from one village were sent to New York, not for food—for that would be legitimate—but for human beautification. A three months' trip in South Carolina furnished for the market 11,000 bird skins. One sportsman furnished 10,000 white egrets, and at Cape Cod in one season 40,000 terns were slain for the same purpose. A million were destroyed in a very little while. An establishment of New York bargained to furnish a Parisian firm with 40,000 of those dead musicians. A million bobolinks near Philadelphia were killed in one month! Whole species of birds have become extinct through persistent springing of the trap and flashing of the gun. One house in New York had on hand 200,000 bird skins. One auction room in London, in three months, sold 356,000 East India bird skins, and 404,000 West India and Brazilian bird skins. If for scientific museums they were taken, or for human diet, that would be excusable, but this universal war is now mostly waged either for fun or fashion.

What a state of things when a daily paper says of a lady's head-dress, "She had a whole nest of sparkling, scintillating birds in her hair, which it would have puzzled an ornithologist to classify," and says of another, "Her gown was of unrelieved black, looped up with blackbirds, and a winged creature so dusky that it could have been intended for nothing but a crow, reposed among the braids of hair." What is most needed and what will be most effective will be the establishment of a public sentiment in American womanhood that shall be opposed to this bird slaughter. If once they realize the wrong they will extinguish it. The kindly and songful birds have enough enemies without human antagonism. No creatures of God have a harder time to live than they. The wife of a United States Senator told my family the following incident: She said to the great Alexander Stephens, "Come and see my canary bird that has just died." "No," said Governor Stephens, "I cannot look at a dead bird with any composure.; it makes me cry." Surely, if God declares his deep interest in the birds, we need not be ashamed of having a feeling of regard for them.

PERNICIOUS AMUSEMENTS.

THE sacrifice of one's regular business is a great mistake. I never see a man go out with fishing rod to sport but I silently say "May you have a good time, and the right kind of bait, and a basket full of catfish and flounders." I never see a party having a pleasant ride but I wish them a joyous round, and say, "may the horses not cast a shoe nor the traces break, and may the horses' thirst not compel them to stop at any taverns." In a world where God lets his lambs frisk and his trees toss, and his brooks leap, and his stars twinkle, I know he intended even at times to laugh and sing, and sport. Out upon that fashion that will let a man smile, but pronounce him vulgar if he ha-ha's. Out upon that style of Christianity that will make a man's face the counter on which to measure religion by the yard. But while all this is so, every thinking man will acknowledge that too much devotion to amusement is ruinous. Many of the clergy in the last century lost their theology in a fox chase. Many a splendid business has had its brains knocked out by fast horses. Many a man has smoked up his prospects in Havanas of the best brand. I offer this as a principle: Those amusements are harmless that do not interfere with home duties and enjoyments. Those are ruinous which give one a distaste for domestic pleasure and recreation.

I offer home as a preventive, as an inspiration, as a restraint. Home! It is a charmed word. Through that one syllable thrills untold melody, the laughter of children, the sound of well-known footsteps and the voices of undying affection. Home! Upon that word there dropped the sunshine of boyhood and the shadow of tender sorrows and the reflection of ten thousand fond memories.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

AN EXTEMPORIZED FUNERAL.

ONE of the strangest spectacles in all the varieties of funeral arrangement, was witnessed in the neighborhood of Delagoa Bay in South Eastern Africa. Delagoa Bay is in the district which has long been the subject of dispute with England, Portugal and the Republic of the Transvaal. About twenty years ago the dispute was submitted to the arbitration of the President of the French Republic, who gave judgment in favor of Portugal. Since that time there have been frequent disturbances, and at one time the Boers made a settlement there in spite of the Portugese. A railroad is now being constructed in the territory with the hope of opening up the resources of the surrounding country. Not long ago, one of the officers employed in the construction, died at the scene of his labor. It was at a place far up the country a long way from the resources of civilization, but his comrades were anxious to give him decent burial. But in that pestiferous region burial has to follow very speedily on a death, and there was no time to send to the coast for a coffin. The natives would have been satisfied to wrap the body in any kind of covering, or to bury it as it was, but the white men would not hear of such an arrangment. A coffin of some kind they would have, and in default of anything better, they utilized the cases in which the stores had been sent to camp. The ends of the cases were knocked out and a sufficient number to hold the body were roughly fastened together. The body was put into this extemporized coffin, and before it was committed to the ground, one of the men read the English burial service over it. It was the best the men could do in the circumstances and they were glad to get any kind of thing to serve as a coffin, but the effect was somewhat incongrous as the cases still bore the inscriptions orignally put on them. One part of the coffin bore the brand of whiskey, another of brandy, a third of beer, and so on. Little did it signify, however, to the dead man or to his comrades what was written on the rude coffin. Many a costly coffin and many a granite headstone above it has borne a misleading inscription before this, and it has done neither good nor harm. The matter that is all important is what is written respecting the dead in God's book, or as was revealed to the seer of Patmos, "The dead are judged out of those things that are written in the books according to their works." (Rev. 20: 12.)

A Bird's Confidence.

A farmer in New Jersey reports a singular incident of a bird's sagacity and friendliness. He was taking a load of wood from the forest near Gladstone, N. J. to his home, when a bird, which he recognized as a ruffled grouse, rose from the ground and after circling round his wagon a few times, alighted on his load near to where he sat. The farmer, knowing well how shy and timid these birds are, was astonished at the extraordinary conduct of this specimen. He reached over toward it, fully expecting that it would fly away, but it suffered him to take it up and it nestled into his hands as if glad to be in his keeping. Puzzled how to account for the bird's departure from the habits of its kind, he looked around and soon discovered the reason. High overhead, a large hawk was hovering, evidently with designs on the grouse. Doubtless the grouse was aware of its danger and had fled to the wagon for refuge. The farmer put the bird in a safe shelter among the wood, and drove on, expecting it would fly away when it was out of danger But the bird did not stir and when he reached home it made no attempt to escape, but it allowed him to take it from the wagon, and put it in a chicken-coop where he still has it. It would be well if Christians who have been beset by the great enemy of souls and have been delivered by the Saviour, would ever afterward do as the grouse did. Too often, after the danger is past, they venture again into the way of temptation and are unmindful of Christ's claims upon them. (II. Peter 2: 22.)

A Possible Source of Wealth.

A writer in a financial journal hazards the prediction that in the not distant future Canada will control the ship-building industry of the world. He bases his prediction on the fact that in Canada above every country on earth is found in apparently inexhaustible quantities the nickeliferous pyrites which will enter so largely into the construction of the merchant and war navies of the world. He contends that the steamers of the future must necessarily have a large quantity of nickel in their composition, and that it will not be long before shipbuilders realize the fact. It has, he says, been proved that the mixture of nickel with steel has precisely the results most needed in the construction of ships. It doubles the strength of the steel, and as it is much lighter than steel, it will reduce the weight of the ship, and so need far less power and less fuel to propel the ship through the waves. Beside which, nickel does not corrode nor take on barnacles, so that a ship made of nickel-steel would never need to be laid up for scraping. If the facts are as alleged, there is little doubt that the metal will come into general use in the construction of ships, the advantages being too obvious to be overlooked. It is much to be wished that similar advantages could be secured for the church. Its progress, although rapid compared with former times, might be still faster if it were stronger, had less weight to carry, and if it could be kept clear of the barnacles of worldliness, inconsistencies, selfishness, and intolerance, which cling to it and impede its progress. (Rev. 3: 2, 3.)

A Narrow Escape.

A lumberman who works on the St. John River near Grand Falls recently told the story of a wonderful experience to the reporter of a Boston journal. He said that he and his men were rolling logs down a bluff into the river one evening after a hard day's work. Most of the great, heavy logs rolled smoothly down the bluff into the water, but one that was crooked, slewed around in its descent and getting end first, settled about two-thirds of the way down. One of his men was therefore sent down to dislodge it. While he was working it around the other men brought another gigantic log to the brink. They balanced it with their "peevies," until the man who had gone down should get out of the way. They were looking over, watching him tugging at the obstinate log, when one of the men missed his footing and slipped. The end of the log was released as he fell and the other men were compelled to let go to save themselves from being hurled over the bluff. A cry of alarm was raised to the man below, but there was no time for him to get out of the path of the log. His comrades looked over, expecting to see him crushed and mangled under the huge descending log. It rolled on, gaining velocity at every yard, but just before it reached the man, it struck a rock or some other projection and gave a great bound into the air. It passed clear over his head and struck the ground again several feet beyond him, rolling harmlessly to the foot of the declivity. The lumberman said that they had rolled thousands of logs down that same bluff, but never before had he seen a log leap into the air as that one did. There was nothing incredible about it, for the projection which caused the leap was plainly visible to all, but it was remarkable that the only log to strike the projection should have been one that would have crushed out a human life if it had not struck it. Special providences and answers to prayer are often disbelieved and ridiculed, but this incident shows how, without a miracle or suspending natural laws, God can order events to meet special cases. The "one chance in ten thousand," may be timed in his hands to occur at the right moment. (II. Peter 2: 9.)

A Dishonest Bridegroom.

A shameful confession was made by a man who was arrested in Brooklyn, N.Y., last week. For several days prior to his arrest, he had been a frequent visitor at a saloon in the city and while loitering about the bar had offered valuable articles of jewelry for sale, at very low prices. His readiness to sell them so cheap excited suspicion and the police were notified. They were convinced that the man had acquired possession of the valuables dishonestly, and arrested him. After a day or two in prison pending the result of police investigation, the prisoner made a confession which showed that he had been guilty of deserting his wife as well as committing robbery. He said that while in Germany lately, he learned that a certain family in Frankfort had some rare jewels which were kept in the home they occupied. He determined to steal them, but as the house was strongly guarded, he was unable to break in. He therefore decided on a strategem. He made love to one of the women servants and married her. He then had a plausible excuse for visiting the house and was admitted freely. At the first opportunity he seized the jewels and fled with them to America. He admitted that he had no affection for the woman he had made his wife, but had merely married her to gain access to the house. No one thinks of blaming the poor girl who was victimized; but when it is shown, as it frequently is, that some defaulter was active in church work before his defalcation was discovered, it is a common thing to cast reproach on the church. In the majority of cases the wrongdoer, like the stealer of the jewels, was playing a part throughout and to further his purpose professed an attachment that he never experienced. (I. John 2: 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Jewish Emigration from Russia Last Year, voluntary and assisted, amounted to a quarter of a million souls.

The Reformed Church in America asks its members for $140,000 for foreign missions this year This will mean $1.40 for each member. That proportion was exceeded in the Classis of New York last year, but not in the country Classes.

Mr. C. M. Gill, the Famous Athlete of Yale University, has offered himself to the Presbyterian Mission Board for service as a missionary. He is willing to go to either China or Africa. Mr. Gill was captain of the football team at Yale and was a member of the University boat crew for three years.

Major Hilton has been Holding Successful meetings at Dixon, Ill. The local journals say that large accessions have resulted to all the churches. The number of cards signed and sent to the evangelist was 776, and of these one half have made profession of faith in Christ.

Dr. Talmage Preached last Sunday Afternoon in the Academy of Music, New York, to an enormous audience. The services are to be held every Sunday afternoon during the winter. Their object and further particulars about them are stated in an announcement in another column.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union has arranged to present its polyglot petition against the liquor traffic to Congress on Feb. 15. It has four million signatures, and fifty different nations are represented among the signers. Duplicates are to be presented to the Monarchs or Presidents of the other nations.

There are Now Seventy-five Congregational Churches in the Territory of Oklahoma. Five years ago, there were but two in the entire Territory.

The "Presbyterian" of Sydney, Australia, says that Dr. John G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides, took back with him, as the product of his missionary tour around the world, the large sum of $125,000, which he handed over to the Foreign Mission Board of the Victorian Church.

Rev. John T. Vine has just Returned to New York from the Catskil Mountains. He reports large meetings at East Durham, Gay Head, Freston Hollow, Hawrerville and Flat Creek. In each place many persons made profession of faith as a result of God's blessing on the services.

Rev. Gilbert Reid has Arrived in safety at his station in Chefoo, China. The vessel on which he sailed was overhauled by the Japanese off the Chinese coast, and two of his fellow-travellers were sent to Japan as prisoners as they were suspected of having a political object in visiting China. Mr. Reid says: "The Japanese proposed to take me as prisoner, too, but when the French and American Consuls certified that I was a preacher, they desisted. For once in my life it was a good thing to be a missionary." Mr. Reid was warmly welcomed.

Dr. J. W. Chapman's Meetings at Indianapolis closed Dec. 21. For two weeks Tomlinson Hall, which seats four thousand persons, was crowded every night and hundreds were turned away. A chorus of three huudred voices, led by Mr. Bilhorn, assisted. Upwards of three thousand cards have been received by pastors and they are busy looking up inquirers.

The Full Figures for the Lutheran Branches in this country are now 5,514 pastors, 4,830 parochial school teachers, 9,457 congregations, and 1,462,217 communicants or confirmed members. The official United States statistics for 1890 credited the Lutherans with 8,595 organizations and 1,231,072 communicants.

Dr. Charles L. Hoffman, Rector of the Church of All Angels, New York, has presented the Church with a new building for Christian work. It is three stories high and will comprise technical schools, a kindergarten, Sunday School, gymnasium, offices for the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, and rooms for the use of other organizations of church work.

The Pope of Rome Forbids membership on the part of Roman Catholics in the orders of Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows, and Sons of Temperance. The archbishops of the Church united in advising the Pope to take this step. The Catholic members of these orders will now be in the disagreeable dilemma of either quitting the order to which many have paid large sums of money or of losing their standing in the Church.

Mr. D.L. Moody's Meetings at Lowell, Mass., closed on December 23. The city has never before had so stirring a time of revival. Hundreds of conversions have taken place. One of the most remarkable converts is a prominent business man who is eighty-six years of age. Many victims of strong drink have been reclaimed, and a number of Catholics have confessed Christ in the meetings. The ministers of the twenty-eight churches uniting in the movement have decided to continue the Saturday afternoon ministers' prayer-meeting, which has been a special feature.

THE SUPREME MOTIVE.

A Sermon delivered in the First Baptist Church, Richmond, Va., by Rev. Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, of Atlanta, Ga. Text: I. Peter 4: 11, "That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ."

IN all that he said and did and suffered, the master motive of the Lord Jesus was to glorify God. He began his earthly career with a declaration of this motive, and on the eve of his departure he looked God in the face and protested that in all his ministry to men he had glorified him. He sought glory for himself that he might use it in glorifying his Father in heaven.

The question is sometimes asked, "How can God be glorified? How is it possible to glorify a being who is from everlasting to everlasting infinitely glorious? He is infinite in his perfections. He is the maker, ruler, and preserver of the universe. What can be done to make him more glorious?" My answer is that God is glorified by any revelation or manifestation of his glory. God is invisible. He dwells in light unapproachable. To be appreciated and loved, he must be known. We must know who he is, and what he is. Neither men nor angels could adore, love, and serve an unknown and unknowable God. For this reason God provided for of his attributes, character and will to the intelligent creatures of his hand. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; and the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us full of truth and grace." Jesus Christ is that Word. "He was God manifest in the flesh." In his visible human personality in life and death he declared him to the world. He brought out his attributes from their dark obscurity and displayed them. When Philip said, "Lord, show us the Father," his reply was, "He that has seen me hath seen the Father. Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me he doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very work's sake."

Christ has been the organ through which the divine nature has manifested itself; and as it has been manifested, God has been known, loved, worshipped, and obeyed by countless millions of his creatures. They have seen his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, and filled with adoring rapture, they have made earth and heaven resound with their "Gloria in excelsis."

God Interpreted.

The blended beauties of the sunbeam had never been known, if God had not provided the means of revealing them. When the sunbeam falls upon the prism its wealth of exquisite tints is revealed, and by this revelation the sun is glorified. The poet and the painter see beauties in nature which are hidden from common mortals like you and me. When these hidden charms are revealed to us on canvass, or in descriptive poetry, nature is glorified. Many of us would have but a feeble appreciation of Shakespeare, if he had not been interpreted by men of dramatic genius. When some great teacher uncovers to us the wondrous wealth of thought in Hamlet, or Macbeth, Shakespeare is glorified. Alexander Pope's translation of the Illiad was not so much a translation of the words of the great Greek epic, as it was an interpretation of the genius and spirit of its matchless author. Thus Homer was glorified by one who understood him, and who revealed to others the sublimity of his immortal work. In an infinitely superior sense, the Son has been the medium through which the Father has been revealed and glorified.

"The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork." But who made the heavenly bodies? The Bible says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth;" but two thousand years later an inspired writer ascribed the work of creation to Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of God. "All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that is made." There is no contradiction here. The Son was the medium through which the creative power of the eternal Godhead was exerted. His creative work is a manifestation of the invisible Jehovah to his intelligent creatures, and by this manifestation

God is Glorified.

So wonderfully do the spangled heavens declare the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, that the poet Young, as he gazed upon the solemn pomp of the midnight sky, exclaimed "An undevout astronomer is mad!" How it quickens the divine side of our nature, and lifts us above the cravings of the flesh, to see the infinite Spirit in the stars which splendor the nightly sky.

> There's not a scene to mortals given
> That more divides the soul and clod,
> Than yon proud heraldy of heaven—
> Yon burning blasonry of God.

And when we are thus taught, inspired, and enraptured, by the manifestation of divinity in the wonders of creation, God is glorified.

Jesus Christ made the heavens and the earth for the glory of God, and he controls them for the same purpose. When I say that he controls the earth, I mean not merely that he holds it in its orbit around the sun, and in its revolutions upon its own axis. I mean also that he controls the creatures that live upon its surface. He controls men. They may follow their own rebellious wills and depraved lusts, but he overrules them, and manifests the glory of God in the disasters and sufferings which he permits them to bring upon themselves. If you think that Jesus Christ has nothing to do with the tidal wave of sentiment which at one time overwhelms one great political party in this country, and places another in power, you deceive yourselves. If you think again that he has nothing to do with the return of a defeated party to power, you are still more sadly deluded. He is behind all such revolutions, and through them he glorifies God by making men to see and feel that they cannot, with impunity, ignore his truth and righteousness.

Christ has revealed and glorified God in creation and providence, but in his own life and words and death, there is a revelation of God which glorifies him infinitely more than creation and providence. When Jesus Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judea, the angels of God gathered over his cradle and sang "Glory to God in the Highest." It was this new and about to be made to the world and the universe, that inspired the angelic Son. In that child of a human mother we see Immanuel—"God with us." "In him was all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." In his personal ministry among men he displayed every attribute of the invisible God. He revealed his power, wisdom, holiness, justice, truth, goodness, love and mercy. The result of that revelation is, that God is glorified as never before, both by men on earth and angels in heaven.

When we study the lives of the apostles, we are convinced beyond all doubt that they had caught the spirit of their self-denying Lord, and that their one dominant motive was to glorify God. Not for emolument, or human praise, did Peter stand up on the day of Pentecost and charge the Jews with the murder of Christ. Not for money, or for office, did he refuse to obey the edict of the court, and tell them he would obey God rather than men. Not for power or place, did Paul forsake Phariseeism, and the high position which he held as a learned and brave devotee of the Hebrew religion, to follow the standard and preach the gospel of the crucified Nazarene. Not for worldly advantage did he cross the sea and unfurl the banner of Jesus among a people who were "wholly given to idolatry." Not for human applause did he stand before the royal sensualists and despots and reason of righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come. Not to display his learning and eloquence did he stand on Mars Hill and dispute with the philosophers of Greece, and unfold to them the attributes of that "unknown God" whom they ignorantly worshipped. Not for fame, not to win for himself a place in the history of the world's heroes, not to project his life and power into a distant future, did he encounter hardships and perils, and endure bonds, imprisonments and stripes, and finally perish by a Roman sword. In all his toils, struggles and sufferings, he protested that his supreme motive was the glory of God.

I trust that I shall have the approbation of your judgment and consciences when I say, that this should be

Our Motive.

In working for this we cannot fail. Success is as certain as the promise, righteousness and power of a faithful God can make it. If I preach the gospel with the desire and purpose to glorify God, I do glorify him. Not only by my words, but by the spirit and manner in which they are uttered, God's truth and character are manifested, exalted, and glorified. If a man should come into this pulpit and preach the gospel merely to entertain you, or to magnify himself in your eyes, you would certainly discover his motive. His sermon, however spiritual, orthodox, and clear and strong in statements of truth, would make no impression upon your hearts and consciences. You would see in it not a manifestation of God, but an exhibition of the gifts and attainments of the preacher. While you might admire the speaker, there would be no stir of your moral nature, no consciousness of your sin, or of any desire to bring your lives into harmony with God. Such a preaching of the gospel does not glorify God. The man who can stand in the pulpit, and honestly say, "For me to live is Christ," is not a failure. He accomplishes what he desires and purposes—the glory of God.

Failure Impossible.

How comforting and inspiring to know, that in the sublimest of all human undertakings, there is not the possibility of failure. Only about one man in five hundred who seeks material wealth, succeeds. Not more than one artist in a thousand ever makes himself known and felt beyond the community in which he lives and labors. In the great army of men and women who devote themselves to literature, only a few rise to enduring fame, Out of the millions of men who aspire to great oratorical power and distinction, only two or three in a generation electrify a country. Almost every man, in the earlier years of his life, catches the martial fever, and determines to dazzle the world with the splendor of his military genius. How many succeed? How many Bonapartes, Wellingtons, Grants, Lees, and Jacksons can you count in any one nation, or in any one generation of mankind? But the man whose master-passion and purpose is to be Christ-like, and thereby glorify God, does not and cannot fail. He succeeds, and when death removes him from the post of duty here, God will robe him in all the paraphernalia of celestial royalty, and celebrate the triumphs of his earthly mission in an eternal anthem of celestial praise. Human aspiration can soar to nothing higher, and human effort can accomplish nothing grander than this.

Working for the glory of God is the only activity that Satisfies the Human Soul.

You consecrate your powers to the pursuit wealth, and realize your highest anticipations of success, but as you stand in the midst of your accumulated treasures, you are conscious of disappointment. There is a great aching void in your being that your hoarded riches cannot fill. You may mount the ladder of fame and climb to the topmost round, but when you reach the dizzy height your first experience is one of disappointment. As you look out on banners waving from a thousand heights, in token of your success, and hear the roar of multitudes, as they rend the air and shake the solid earth with their rapturous applause, your deeper and diviner nature sighs for something better. But the man who walks with God and lives for God, finds at every step a new and more satisfying joy. Glorifying God is an endless undertaking. When a man has done his best, it is still before him, beckoning him on to the summits which look like mountains rising above mountains in endless succession. But every hour of labor and struggle brings with it an experience of deeper and diviner satisfaction.

There are church members who attach great importance to a large congregation, and their religious activity consists chiefly in efforts to enlarge the congregation with which they worship; but if in doing this they are not moved by a desire to glorify God, their labors are unsanctified, unacceptable, and in the great and judgment they will be rejected as "dead works." I find men sometimes in the ranks of temperance reformers, who, though brave and determined, are impelled more by a desire to protect their own households, to reduce taxation, and to advance the prosperity of the country, than by any heartfelt concern for God's truth and kingdom and glory. Such reformers are of but little value to the cause for which they battle. When you appeal to a community to abolish its bar-rooms and gambling-houses on the ground that these institutions are hurtful to your material interests, your motive is too selfish and low to command respect. It is almost on a level with with that of the depraved and consciencelss wretches who run the bar-rooms and gambling-houses. If in your efforts to remove these curses you ignore God and his glory, you are doomed to inglorious defeat.

Motive in Giving.

To make any gifts of our possessions to a good cause acceptable, we must give ourselves to God. A few years ago, in the midst of a great temperance crusade, a whiskey-seller gave forty thousand dollars to endow an Orphan's Home. The trustees of the institution received the donation; but, if they were not hopelessly stupid, they knew that God did not accept it. If they had any capacity for interpreting human conduct, they saw that the motive which inspired the giver, was neither the glory of God nor the welfare of humanity, but a desire to disarm the enemies of his iniquitous business, and to perpetuate a license to make money by wrecking the fortunes, homes, characters, and lives of men. If he had made the gift as an offering to God, he would at the same time have made a bonfire of his liquors, and a surrender of himself to the service of God's truth and kingdom.

It is the high and holy motive presented in the text, that will dignify all life. We make distinctions that heaven does not recognize. You speak of all matters pertaining to your religion as sacred, and of everything else as secular. You speak of great deeds and small deeds. You judge things by their appearances, and the space they occupy among men. But with God, the difference is entirely one of motives. "A sacred motive makes everything sacred; a secular motive puts any human act on a godless level. Little things become great when wrought from and consecration to God; but a mean motive will make the gift of a millionaire shrink into a nutshell as small as itself." The poor woman, who, inflamed with desire to please God, cast her two mites into the Temple treasury, made an immeasurably grander contribution to the world's welfare than the Wall street gambler, who, with ill-gotten gains, builds a monument, or establishes a library, or endows a university, only to hear himself lauded as a public benefactor.

God looks down from heaven and sees in many a community, royalty in rags, and slavery in purple and fine linen. The needlewoman, who plies her humble vocation, that she may have a gift each week to bring to God's altar, is, to angelic eyes, ineffably regal in comparison with the great merchant, who goes into the marts of trade and buys and sells and gets gain, that he may fare sumptuously every day. The most infinitesimal man who breathes the atmosphere of this planet, is the devotee of the club-room, who spends in sensuous gratifications an income that might establish perennial fountains of blessing in his community and country.

If you have a legitimate business, do not imagine that to glorify God you must get ut of it and go into the pulpit. Put the ight motive behind your business, and you ill serve God as acceptably as the most onsecrated preacher of Christ's Gospel. man can glorify God in the practice of aw. To the average person this is inconeivable, but it is not to me. He may glorify Im by using his calling to uphold law, ustice, and good government. But if for he sake of a fee, he could mislead a court nd jury, and thereby turn loose, unwhipped f justice, a thief, or a wayside assassin, I now of no language that will express God's abomination of him. No man has a etter opportunity to please God than the udge, who is charged with the trial of offenses against the laws of his country. If e performs the functions of his high office nbiased by any selfish consideration, and with a sincere desire to uphold virtue and romote the public weal, he is loyal not nly to the commonwealth, but to the righteus ruler of heaven and earth. But if he its upon the bench merely to obey the beests of an army of unwashed sensualists, nd to win the applause and votes of a godess rabble, he is in as little sympathy with ivine truth and government as the aposolic traitor who betrayed the Lord and his eople for thirty pieces of silver.

My brethren, your life will not be a failre, a mystery, a tragedy, a crying in the ark, but a psalm of hope and gladness, a riumphant march along a highway to a livine end, a steady and perpetual rise hrough ever-increasing light toward the entre of all life and the source of all blessdness, if you will only put behind it the notive which brought the divine Redeemer rom the throne of heaven to the manger of Bethlehem and the cross of Calvery. That notive is the glory of God. If for that purpose you live, labor, sacrifice and suffer, when death comes, there will be no alarms and no misgivings. Peacefully, confidently, you will fold your arms, and say with the apostle, "I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith; henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown." Oh, my soul grows impatient with the blessedness of that hour, when my Lord shall say,

Servant of God, well done! Well done!
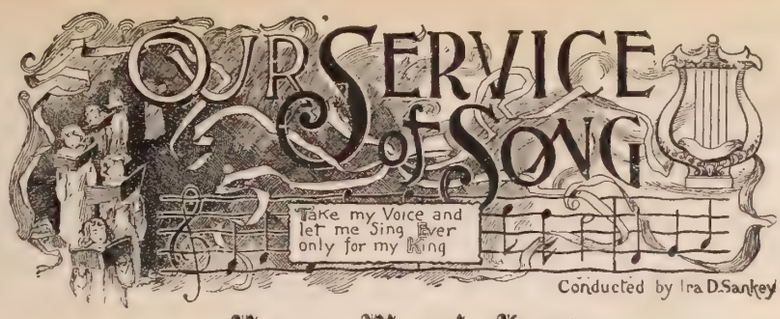
Rest from thy loved employ, and when I shall calmly, gently, sweetly, pass away from the world's dim twilight into day.

AN ATTACK ON A MISSION.

An attempt to establish a mission station at Hagi in Japan has aroused a degree of hostility unusual in that country. Miss Harriet M. Browne thus describes the outbreak in a letter to the "Baptist Missionary Magazine:"

On an evangelistic tour to Hagi in June, just after the purchase of the preacher's place there, Miss Duffield and myself were stoned nine nights. Before the stoning began, and even before a meeting was held, we learned that an organized plot to destroy the work was to be put into execution, and we notified the police, who helped somewhat to protect us, but were powerless to control the mob that gathered every night. The whole front of the place was smashed, tables, dishes, desks and lamps broken, and slight bruises given, but none of us had a serious wound. One night two native women, two children and myself who were in the chapel alone, were driven upstairs, then off the back roof into the yard, where we stood barefoot from 12 P.M. to 1:30 A.M. Posters in red ink, all over the town, declared that the Christians were to be killed and Yaso-kyo [The Jesus Religion] wiped out. Attempts were made on the lives of three Christians, but they and we, though hit by many stones, were providentially saved from serious wounds. All the while there were many inquirers.

Some of the remarks of the mob were: "Your Jesus was crucified, so you ought not to mind these stones we throw;" "Why don't these Christians give up when treated so ill?" Shimose san, the Bible woman, was especially brave. When asked by the man next door why she she believed such a hated religion, she replied by telling of Stephen's death. The preacher's boy, Hiroshi, seventeen years old, was told by his school-mates they would kill him if he did not give up Yaso-kyo. He said, "Very well, I won't give it up." The felt presence of the Lord and his most evident protection was very precious. We count it all joy to have had this privilege to testify by deed. Pray for Hagi. I expect to see a heavy harvest gathered there.



Nearer, Blessed Jesus.

A LITTLE JAPANESE HERO.

A little Japanese lad was engaged on the occasion of a special ceremony in the army to pour out the wine, and, on being asked at the close by the General-in-Chief to take a drink himself, as he must be tired, and in need of something refreshing, the little fellow said he didn't care for any. The General thought this strange, and urged him to take some anyway, as it would be good for his health, even though he disliked it. But our temperance youth persisted that he didn't want any. This somewhat vexed the officer, to find anyone connected with the army guilty of disobeying his orders, and he said rather roughly to the lad, "Well, if you won't do as I say, you never can become a soldier in the army." One of the lower officers who was standing by, and heard the conversation, laughed, and came up to the boy and asked him why he was so disrespectful to the General, threatening that if he persisted in such insubordination, he would cut him down with his sword. (This was in old feudal days.) The brave little fellow, with tears in his eyes, said he could not drink, even if he had to disobey the General's order; and, in fact, he did not think it was necessary for a soldier to obey such orders. His own (the boy's) father, he said, had lost his life through drinking "sake," and when he left home he solemnly promised his mother that he would never taste "sake," and he felt he must keep his word. The officer and the General were so filled with admiration at the boy's simple firmness, that they, from that time, showed him special kindness; and it is said that the boy became one of the most trusted officers in the army.

THE RETURNING SINNER.

(Hosea xiv.)

"RETURN." Oh word of Love, surpassing sweet,
Wherewith the father draws us to His feet
When we would flee!

All spent with pain, and bruised by many falls,
He sees us through the dark, and gently calls,
"Return to Me."

At noonday, as in night, we stumbled, Lord;
The crooked paths we made no peace afford
From day to day.

Oh, now receive, forgive. We need Thy care;
We cannot safely tread this desert bare.
Teach us Thy way.

We stand afar—we cannot venture near—
Dark seems it, though Thy gracious voice we hear
From our low place.

Lord, we are fatherless apart from Thee.
Our sins are as a wall—we cannot see
Thy glorious face.

THE LITTLE SEASON.

Light Shed on the Character of the Millenninm by the Outbreak at its End.

BY GEO. F. TRENCH, B.A.*

THE moral character of the millennium, as well as the political and material conditions of the world in that period, have been generally understood by students of prophecy as presenting an almost perfect state of sinlessness, harmony, and prosperity. It is a task possessing little of attractiveness or satisfaction to show that in these respects our notions of the coming dispensation have been exaggerated.

We looked from our earth-prison, and thought the outside light was heaven. And this was natural. The heart found rest and soothing in the thought of a universal jubilee, and fondly believed that this was at once to come to pass, yea, that it was "even at the doors." But in truth, the transition will not be so immediate or so complete. A better dispensation is at hand, no doubt, with tremendous blessings in its lap. But the perfect state will not be yet.

The same passage (Rev. 20) which fixes the length of the coming kingdom of Christ on earth at a thousand years, and which describes the arrest of Satan and his imprisonment during that period, reveals also that at its end there will be this great and world-wide revolt against Christ. The language is perfectly clear and most startling: "When the thousand years are finished, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall come forth to deceive the nations which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to the war; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up over the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints, and the beloved city."

I beg attention to these significant words. They indicate, as I read the passage, that the greater portion of mankind, at the end of the thousand years' reign, will be in a condition of spiritual death, and of bondage to sin and Satan, while the saints will be a small body easily encompassed and besieged by the host of the infidel armies. It is evident that the people of Israel, and the city of Jerusalem, beloved of God, are the objects of the attack. The people of Israel will have been all saved (Rom. 11: 26) from the date of the Lord's reappearance, when the sight of him whom they had pierced will lead to their conversion. Besides the saints of Israel and Jerusalem, there will be found at the outbreak of the war, scattered here and there among the nations, an election of loyal and faithful men, who will not join the great mobilization, or be numbered in the levies that will form the largest allied army ever yet seen on earth. That the fullness of Israel will lead to the riches of the Gentiles in every material sense, so long as they own Christ's sceptre, we know (Rom. 11: 12). That there will be godly persons found among sons of the stranger (Isa. 56: 3-8) we also know. And when, at Satan's summons, men flock to the standard of revolt, in numbers as the sand of the sea, coming up over the breadth of the earth, and from its four corners, there can be no doubt that individuals here and there among the nations will stand aloof, faithful to the end. But the masses, the world's population, will be in revolt.

By means, therefore, of this short and terrible glimpse of the Millennium's end, a flood of light is cast back upon the moral character of the world during the whole of the thousand years preceding. It is a condition of outward and seeming peace, calm, and contentment; but inwardly the heart of man is what it always has been—enmity against God and against his Christ. Discontent is forced underneath the surface by the rod of iron (Ps. 2: 8, 9). The nations will be Christ's possession, and the uttermost parts of the earth his inheritance, not by conversion, but by coercion, to be "broken in pieces like a potter's vessel," at their first resistance; held down as the "footstool of his feet" throughout that age; and at its end when in irrepressible and incorrigible hostility they dare once more to lift the rebel hand against him, to be utterly and finally destroyed by fire from heaven.

THE CHRISTIAN'S PERPLEXITIES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Jan. 20. I. Kings 4: 29-34; Luke 11: 31; 2: 46.

EVERY Christian has his perplexities. They are above him, around him, and within him. In nature, in providence, in the Bible, in his own heart, and life, they confront him and challenge his understanding and his wisdom. And this is no proof of ignorance or stupidity. It is the keenest, most penetrating minds which perceive these problems and fail to solve them. And they are not alone intellectual. Some of the most difficult are moral and practical. With the most earnest wish to think right and to do right, there is often a paralyzing incapacity to know what is right. Looking back over his life, the Christian has to sorrowfully admit that he has often blundered. The precipitance or the negligence of a moment has entailed on him years of weariness and restriction. It is too late for remedy; he will not pass that way again. He must bear the incubus that he incurred. Is there no way in which he can attain the power of seeing and doing the right thing at the right time? Examining ourselves, we perceive that the power to which we must look for this much-needed guidance is the conscience. That is the eye of the soul. If that power performed its functions properly, if it never hesitated and never misled us, we should have what we need. The conscience fails us and there is the secret of the difficulty. It is not the secret of all difficulties of conduct. The will often disobeys the conscience and the man does wrong knowing that he is doing wrong. But that is not the case with which we are dealing. The difficulty here is on higher ground. It is experienced by the man who has left the lower life and is living for something higher than self-gratification. For him light is needed, and it comes from above. The voice which spoke to Solomon giving him his choice of blessings, comes to everyone seeking divine illumination. To the man whose desire is for riches, or honors, or for self in any form it has nothing to say; but to him who above all things desires wisdom, that he may do his duty and be a blessing to all with whom he comes in contact, it speaks words of peace. Jesus gave his own assurance of the blessing." If any man will do his will, he shall know." The gift comes in the doing. It is not denied to any who seek it in the way of obedience. The constant effort to live in God's way, the readiness to walk in any path that God has marked out, is the open hand into which God puts the blessing. The conscience is quickened and enlightened. It gains perception and precision. The flash of the light from the great white throne illumines the darkness and gradually the illuminated circle enlarges. Outside its circumference there is the darkness, but about the feet there is always light and the next step cannot be uncertain.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN EUROPE.

The following communication from Mr. J. Willis Baer, Secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, contains the welcome news of Dr. Clark's recovery, and of the rapid progress of the Christian Endeavor movement on the other side the Atlantic:

"Rev. F. E. Clark, President of the United Society, has just returned from a four months' trip to Europe. Though his health was much broken in the summer, he reports himself as quite well and strong once more, having had a few weeks of absolute rest in Switzerland and Italy. Of late, at the request of many Christian people in Germany and Scandinavia, he has been attending meetings in Berlin, Frankfort, Leipsic, Dresden, Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Christiania in the interests of the Endeavor Society. In all these countries he found much interest in the movement, especially in Germany, where already some societies have been formed since his visit, with a promise of many thousands in the years to come. He also attended special meetings in Great Britain for two weeks, addressing large gatherings of young people in different parts of Wales, Ireland, and Scotland. In London five thousand Endeavorers assembled in the Metropolitan Tabernacle; while in Bristol no building large enough to accommodate the audience could be obtained, and two simultaneous meetingswere held. So in Edinburgh, Dublin, Cardiff, and other centres, great throngs of Christian Endeavorers came, together with their pastors and older friends.

"Dr. Clark reports the enthusiam for the society as quite equal to that which he finds in America. The Baptists are the leaders numerically in Christian Endeavor in England, although other evangelical denominations are coming well to the fore. England took the famous badge banner for the greatest number of societies formed during the last year, and our English friends are evidently inclined to keep it on their side of the water. Dr. Clark says that much interest in the great International Convention in Boston next July is already manifested among the societies of Great Britain, and an excursion is even being talked of from Ireland to attend that meeting. Altogether he feels that the prospect was never so encouraging for the Endeavor movement as to-day in all denominations and in all parts of the world. Like the Sunday School, it is rapidly becoming a world-wide movement. The new year will undoubtedly begin with more than 37,000 Christian Endeavor societies, representing not far from two million and a quarter members."

FOR THE DESTITUTE.

Inquiries have been received from several Societies in response to our appeal for the destitute sufferers in Nebraska and Kansas. We are glad to hear that an effort will be made by the Societies to relieve the urgent needs of these afflicted people. We have opened a depot to which gifts of clothing and supplies may be sent, and have made arrangements with the American Express Company to forward them to the needy districts free of charge. Any Society making up packages of clothing will therefore have no further expense than the expressage to New York. They should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Depot for the Relief of Western Sufferers, 740-742 Broadway, New York City. Gifts of money may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, Bible House, New York City, and these will be sent to reliable persons in the districts, who will distribute the money free of charge.

HELPING THE GIRLS.

We have already at various times mentioned the excellent work being done by the Women's Christian Association of Philadelphia. On this page is a picture of one of the most popular rooms in the magnificent building owned by the Association. This is the Library and Reading-Room. It is thoroughly well arranged and organized and the members of the Association put it to good use. The Library itself is divided into reference and loan library, the reference department being classified and well catalogued. The loan library is of lighter order, but is by no means one in which fiction preponderates. History, biography, travel, art and science are well represented. Volumes from this section are eagerly sought and go out at the rate of about seven hundred a month. The Reading-Room is equipped with Reviews, Magazines and Newspapers and there is besides a corner devoted to Art, where portfolios covering every department are at the service of the members. Studies in black and white, studies in china, flower and miscellaneous painting are to be found there, and the students in the various classes avail themselves of their help. How valuable such a refuge must be to the young women of the city, especially to such as live in boarding houses and those who are in business houses it is easy to perceive. Here an intelligent girl away from home and friends in a great city, may find congenial society as well as food for the mind. An institution which makes such provision, deserves the cordial support of all citizens and all the financial assistance it may need.

A NEW STATE B. Y. P. UNION.

Alabama has organized a State Union of Baptist Young People. At a convention recently held in Montgomery officers were elected and the Union regularly organized. Over one hundred delegates representing twenty-five Unions attended and the meetings were held in the First Church. The programme bore this inscription, setting forth the objects of the Union: "The Unification of Baptist Young People;" "Their Increased Spirituality;" "Their Stimulation in Christian Service;" "Their Edification in Christian Knowledge;" "Their Instruction in Baptist History and Doctrine;" "Their Enlistment in Missionary Activity through Existing Denominational Organizations." The following permanent officers were elected: Prof. P. H. Mell, President; W. L. Chandler, Montgomery, A. M. McIntosh, Dadeville, Vice-Presidents; W. D. Dunlap, Birmingham, Secretary. An executive board was appointed to have charge of the affairs of the convention to provide for courses of lectures, and appoint delegates to meet with kindred bodies. Provision was also made for developing the young people in the churches in Christian work and leading them to hearty co-operation with the denomination in mission work. The constitution and by-laws, after some amendments, were unanimously adopted. The next convention is to be held in Birmingham in April, and a delegation was appointed to represent the State at the national convention at Baltimore in July. The sessions were of a most enthusiastic character, the delegates showing a hearty interest in the Union and its work.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, now more than six years old, numbers 227 chapters, and has a membership of over 5600, representing twelve denominations.

The Neighborly Circle of King's Daughters, of Chicago, gave a "parcel entertainment" recently, the admission being a parcel whose contents were distributed among the poor on Christmas morning.

Nearly four thousand Endeavorers crowded the great Town Hall at Sydney at the consecration meeting of the recent New South Wales convention.

Every one of the 1200 convicts in the Kentucky penitentiary at Frankfort received a letter from the Christian Endeavor Society of Louisville on Christmas day. These letters were of a religious nature, and no two were worded alike. Many of the prisoners have signified their intention of answering the letters.

At the Christian Endeavor convention of Victoria, Australia, held at Melbourne, the reports showed that excellent relief, evangelistic and missionary work has been done in the colony during the year. Thirty-two Endeavorers from Victoria are in mission fields, and more than $2500 have been given to the missionary boards.

The Young Men's Christian Association connected with Lafayette College has erected a monument at Martin's Creek to the memory of David Brainerd. It was there that Brainerd built his house December 6, 1744, and wrote much of his memorable journal and labored among the Indians with marked success, so that many converts were gathered.

Mr. Lidbeck, General Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Gothenburg, in Sweden, sends the gratifying intelligence that the building fund of his Association amounts at present to about 100,000 francs ($20,000), and the number of members to 350.

The fifth biennial convention of the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada will meet in Pittsburg, April 18-21. Already the plans of the convention committee are well under way for an especially strong and practical convention.

ROMAN STANDARDS.

WHEN the illustrious roll of the famous cities of old is reviewed, Rome easily stands at the head. Athens, Jerusalem, Nineveh, even the great Babylon itself were tame in comparison with this imperial capital, seated on its seven hills, and, for a time at least, practically ruling the whole of the known world, civilized and barbarian. In the height of its power the Roman Empire under Augustus had a population of 85,000,000, which in the time of Claudius had increased to 120,000,000. The city on the Tiber had somewhere between 1,500,000 and 2,000,000 souls, so that it must have been as large as New York, even if it did not cover so great an area. The varied society presented a more complex picture than was ever known before, including many different races and nationalities. Its splendors were more striking and imposing, its squalor more appalling than in any other city of Europe.

Our illustration on this page represents a group of Romans under the empire. On the left is an imposing trio—emperor in the centre, with a "lictor," or public functionary, with an ax and rods (fasces), the emblems of his office, on the one side, and on the other a nobleman who is bent on consulting him concerning some document of public importance. The "lictor" wears the simple tunic, or short coat, the others the imposing and graceful toga, that of the emperor being of rich material, trimmed with costly furs. The second group presents two Roman ladies, accompanied by a young slave. Their coiffures are such as give an added dignity to the ladies' figures, while the "stolas" or "pallas"—the outer garments — are gracefully and picturesquely draped on both. The slave wears a short-sleeved tunic, this garment, with suitable modifications, being common to both sexes.

Life among the wealthier classes in imperial Rome in the first century, A. D., was a round of pleasure and gayety. In well-regulated families the first breakfast, "jentaculum," was a light meal; the second breakfast, called "prandium," being somewhat more substantial, while the third meal, "coena," was the principal repast of the day. It was recorded by the chroniclers of the day that the globe was ransacked to supply delicacies for the tables of the rich, and that many of the dinners served cost the most fabulous sums. The favorite attitude at dinner was to be seated or reclining on a "triclinium," or couch, capable of accommodating three persons. For relaxation, there were the gardens, the circus, and the games.

Horticulture was an art greatly favored and the public gardens presented a variety of skilful devices, the bushes and trees being clipped to represent the forms of various animals, the garden walks being hedged with box-wood and the flower-beds arranged with consummate taste in a multitude of attractive designs. A popular pastime was barge-racing in "triremes," or three-oared barges on the Tiber, the oarsmen taking their time from the sound of a flute, a song, or a hammer. Chariot-racing was another prevalent passion with both sexes, and many Roman stables had niches in which were enshrined statues of "Epona," the goddess of the horse, an offering to whom was supposed to bring victory in the contests.

Roman matrons were not all as dignified and severe as history portrays them. Some of the minor writers tell us that many of them were capricious and cruel. It was not an uncommon occurrence for married ladies to stick pins into their slaves for amusement, or by way of punishing some trivial offence. Martial relates that one "great Roman dame," because her slave maid let a single curl of her hair escape from its confining comb, administered such a beating to the poor girl that she fell unconscious to the floor. But the older slaves, trusted servants, were regarded almost as members of the family and addressed the children as "little father," and "little mother." Great care was taken with the education of the young and they began to learn before the age of seven. In the schools, reading was taught twice a day, special attention being devoted to the pronunciation, for a Roman mother would not tolerate her children talking like a provincial.

In writing waxen tablets were generally used, the letters being made with a "stylus" or pencil-shaped piece of metal or agate. Some of the slaves were excellent scholars and were instructors in their owners' families. In still earlier times, their leaden tablets were used for writing purposes. In the British Museum there is a book or series of those engraved leaden sheets which was taken from a heathen temple. Upon them are the names of a number of men and women, but alas! for weak human nature, these names so wonderfully preserved are not those of people whom it was desired to render immortal by preserving them to posterity, but of men and women whom the writers hated and had presented to the gods as objects of malediction and vengeance. The Romans, however, could use papyrus as well as tablets and they held the secret of making both colored and invisible inks, even in those early days.

Rome had already begun to decline when Christianity appeared in the world. Its condition was that of a high civilization, a flourishing commerce, but a terribly degraded state of public and private morals, which resulted at last in bringing about the downfall of the once proud "mistress of the world."

Chinese Women's Small Feet.

Writing from Shanghai, Mrs. Baxter says: I do not think I have told you what the bandaging of the feet really means. Until the age of from four to six, little girls' feet are allowed to develop; then the torture begins. First, the little toe is doubled under the foot, and the poor child, who is constantly screaming with the pain, has to walk with the toe forced under. When she is accustomed to this, the next toe is pressed under, then the next, then the next, until only the great toe remains. Then the heel is pressed up and bandaged against the back of the ankle, so that only the great toe and the ball of the foot, with four toes under it, have to go into the shoe, which is from three to six inches long. The ankle looks like an ill-shaped animal's hoof, and the walk of the women is impossible except for short distances, and some are carried altogether. This foot-bandaging pains them till they are over forty years of age, but fashion compels them to bear it. The man who wants to buy a wife does not ask to see her, but her shoe; and by the smallness of her feet he estimates his future companion.

Backward Children.

A backward child, may indeed be deficient in application, writes Margaret Sangster, though not in capacity. Should this be so, arouse him, not by a hailstorm of nagging or a downpour of fault-finding, but by a system of rewards lovingly adapted to his disposition and character. Suffer no discouragement to creep into your own heart concerning him, and do not allow him or her to feel that there is reason for any doubt about the reaching the top of the ladder in due season. The top, mind, not the middle rounds; anyone can reach these. Set a definite aim before your child, cultivate a high and noble ideal.

A Little Hindoo Bride's Doll.

Dr. Edith M. Brown, who has a hospital in India, tells this interesting incident: "One of my patients was a little bride of six years old. One side of her face was very pretty, but the other was greatly disfigured. When I dressed the child's face every day, she used to put up her arm, and point from the tip of her fingers to her elbow. I could not think what she meant, but found out that she had seen a doll about that size and wanted one. I was so glad to be able to find one that English children had been sent out to give her. There is a woman here, quite forty years old, and one day she came to the house crying bitterly, really in great distress; and what do you think was the reason? She had broken her doll! Another poor young woman, whose children had all died when small, and who had just lost a baby a few months old, said: 'Miss Sahib, I sit all day long and think and think of my baby and feel so miserable and lonely. Could you let me have a doll?'"

A YOUNG GIRL'S WORK OF LOVE.

FAME, which usually evades those who seek after it most strenuously, once came to a young girl in a most interesting and unexpected way. She lived in a suburb of London, and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Smith, were just ordinary everyday, honest people. One day she wrote out in detail a little incident related by her father and her elder sister. Elizabeth sent the manuscript to Dickens, the famous author, who thought so well of it that he published it in his magazine, "All the Year Round," and sent the child-writer $25, with a suggestion that she keep on writing. This was the literary entree of little Miss Smith, otherwise known by her nom de plume of of Hesba Stretton.

She has been a prolific and most successful writer since that first attempt, and has probably written more that has been read by Sunday School boys and girls than any other woman in a generation. One or more of her volumes are to be found in almost every Sunday School library of size. The years that have passed in her career as a writer, says the "Sunday School Bulletin," have served to form an epoch in Sunday School library literature. As in other things, progress in the character and style of Sunday School literature has been clearly discernible. For two long a time and too great an extent unreal productions have been the meat set before readers in the Sunday School field. Just why does not appear, but happily the last decade has indicated a change in the character of the books put to this use; and notwithstanding the numerous circulating libraries and the unprecedented cheapness of books, the Sunday School library is more of a power than ever before. For many years, in fact from her first book, Miss Stretton has so formed her stories as to make them helpful, stimulating and life-like. As a woman, she is one of those uncommon characters, who toil in a quiet, simple way, dreading and avoiding any circumstance that serves to bring them personally before the public. She has been instrumental in placing much good reading into the hands of the children of English-speaking countries.

"Pleasing Mother."

The effort at "pleasing mother" should be cultivated in the childish heart. Early in life they should begin the cultivation of thought and effort with reference to the gratification of her wishes and of making her happy. If they would do this they would find daily opportunities for speaking kind words and rendering such helpful services and showing such noble traits of character in dealings with others, as would gladden the heart and lighten the cares of mother in a way too often little thought of. If boys, if girls, could but realize their indebtedness to their mothers, they certainly would generally be very much more anxious about pleasing them. The great men of the world, who have acknowledged their great indebtedness to their mothers, took great delight in pleasing them. But most of all their noble lives, their courage in doing right, and their honorable achievements in public life were especially pleasing to their noble mothers. Hardly a higher tribute can be paid to any young man's success in life than that "it pleased his mother."

The Guiding Hand.

I know the hand that is guiding me
  Throw the shadow to the light;
And I know that all betiding me
  Is meted out aright.
I know that the thorny path I tread
  Is ru'ed by a golden line;
And I know that the darker life's tangled thread,
  The richer the deep design.

A NEW-FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

BY MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Testimony by Suffering.

PATHETIC, almost beyond Annie's conception of possibility, was the spectacle of the patient woman, so cheerful, so gentle, yet with so much to bear. It was a triumphant proof of the power of the spirit, which refused to be subdued and depressed by the pain which tore its frail tenement. Annie looked at her in admiration more than pity. But it might be that the poor creature was buoyed up by a hope of recovery which her friends had been obliged to abandon, so she asked: "Have you no shadow of hope that you may recover?"

"None whatever. There is no hope in my case. I must endure till the end comes. I am sorry to be so great a burden to my friends, but here,too,was a lesson I needed. My pride had to be humbled, for, in good health, I would never ask help,would never trouble any one. I felt a secret pride in my being independent, in doing everything myself. Now you see it is very different. I am perfectly helpless and must be waited upon, but I have the kindest, most patient friends in the world."

"Lucy," interrupted her sister, "you know you're no burden. We tell you this all the time. You are our sunbeam, our comfort, our support when we most break down seeing you suffer."

"Well, I ought to return something for all your trouble and kindness, and its little enough I can do. I actually believe they will weep when I'm gone."

"For ourselves, indeed we will; for you, not a tear."

Mrs. Somers had said but little, only sat and smiled. Annie looked all the amazement she felt. Now Mrs. Somers asked softly: "Does the Saviour still smile upon you? Are no clouds between you and his dear face?"

"My dear sister, I do enjoy my Saviour's presence. He is so good to stay with me so much. Sometimes, I am too happy to express myself; sometimes he gives me 'songs in the night,' and they are the sweetest while others sleep, and he always comes with the pain. Oh! I would not exchange places with anyone I know. I would rather have his presence with pain, than ease without him."

"You are a woman to be envied and not pitied," exclaimed Annie in a tremulous voice. "I came here expecting my nerves to be unstrung by viewing a sufferer writhing in agony. Instead I see before me the happiest woman I ever beheld!"

"To him be all the glory!" said Mrs. Edgefield, folding her hands silently and reverently.

Annie went on with deep feeling: "I came to impart some lessons of patience and trust perhaps, but instead of teaching I am taught, and taught the grandest, sublimest lesson of life or death!"

"Thank God!" exclaimed the sick woman. "Blessed be his holy name, that he still lets my tongue speak for him! My dear young friend, for years my prayer has been, let thy glory be my highest ambition, my greatest joy; let me glorify thee throughout my life, and, in dying, let me glorify thee still. I thank him for answering the last part of my prayer, at least. I have always been a poor, uninfluential woman; was never known further nor otherwise than the Policeman Edgefield's wife, so my circle was very limited. Since my disease has become known, my circle of friends has widened, and I rejoice, for now I can talk of Jesus to more, and I must work for him till death seals my lips. I used to sew sometimes to help my husband. I made dresses in a plain, humble way, and now I think of myself as a piece of work that God is finishing to carry home. There are so many little stitches to put on a dress when you think it done; it is so hard to get it perfectly finished. Here is a stitch needed, there a basting thread to pull out, here a corner not complete, there a button forgotten. Ah! so many things even after it seemed done. So it is with me. I am that piece of work, and God sees so many ravelled ends to cut off, so many little things to be finished; but after awhile-- Ah! after awhile, the last stitch will be put in, the garment will be folded and it will be carried home—done,all finished, complete, perfect!"

"And what a home!" said Mrs. Somers. "What a heaven will burst upon your vision—what a heaven of rest it will be to you!"

"Yes, but better than this, my sister, Christ will be there, and there will be no sin! My Saviour will be there and I shall see him face to face. I shall be like him. Some want to know where heaven is. Christ is my heaven; I want no more."

Annie looked from her face to that of Mrs. Somers, and if a chariot of fire had come down and they had both gone up in a whirlwind, it would not have surprised her much. The two seemed hardly to belong to earth, so much of heaven encircled them, but the hour had come for them to make another visit; so, bidding the sick woman and her sister good-by, and promising to come soon again, they left. As soon as they were out of hearing, Annie exclaimed: "She is the happiest creature I ever saw!"

"Another child of the King! An heir of glory going soon to claim her inheritance. Ought she not to rejoice?"

"Oh, Mrs. Somers, I don't believe I am a Christian at all!"

"Why, my child, you are in the primary department, learning your A, B, C's, and she is nearly ready for her diploma! You are certainly in God's school."

"I could never, never stand her tests."

"No, dear, perhaps not now. A child in fractions,were he to be set down with a problem in trigonometry, why how he would weep and lament over his hard lot! Easy lessons come first; hard ones are coming early enough. Don't look ahead and say, why, I never can do that example in the world. Wait, go on, step by step, God is leading you. One step at a time, then another, just as he shall give you light and grace. That's the way to move on and up."

"There is one line, Mrs. Somers, I have never yet been able to sing, and it is this—

'E'en though it be a cross,
That raiseth me.'"

"Go on singing, go on praying for strength, it will come after awhile. Step by step, my child, and sooner than you think you will break forth into

So by my woe to be,
Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee."

"Here we are at Mrs. Freeman's. She is a poor woman, whose husband is a smart man, a foreman in the printing office of our Daily News, but he drinks. Often and often, he spends his wages for liquor and then his family suffer. The office has discharged him several times, but the proprietor is a kind-hearted man and he takes him back for his wife's sake, and then he is always very penitent himself and full of good promises. She has had a severe affliction lately, but I would rather you should hear it from her own lips."

They reached the cabin, a very poor, one-roomed house, and very poorly furnished. A baby lay in a wooden cradle and the mother herself who came forward looked very feeble. As soon as they were seated, Mrs. Somers began in a cheery voice:—

"Well, Sister Freeman, how's baby?"

"He's better, ma'am. That medicine you sent done him a power of good. It 'pears ta me he's grow'd all of two pounds since he's taken it."

"How is your husband getting on this week? Any better?"

"Not much, ma'am. Bill's just over a spree now. They turned him off, but they taken him back once more."

"I must introduce my friend, Mrs. Deveraux, to you and I wish you would tell her about yourself."

Mrs. Freeman was very willing to talk. Turning to Annie she said: "Well, ma'am, I've been married nigh on to eight year, come this October. I thought I was marrying a sober, hard-working man, when I married Bill Freeman; but it warn't long before I found out that he drank some thing. When I asked what was on his breath, he said 'twant nothing but lager beer, I didn't think there was any more harm in that than there was in water, so he just kept on. Then after awhile, lager beer warn't strong enough for him, and he got whiskey and drank and came home drunk.

"This kept on for years, and he drank so much he like to have lost his place, and we didn't know what on earth we would do for bread, for my baby was just two weeks old, and I couldn't do much, and we had two other children to feed. Nannie (now she wipes away a tear). Ah! she was a good child, Nannie was, as good as any mother ever had, and she helped me all she could. It 'pears to me like that little child was born a Christian, if ever any body was born twice at once, but I don't know about that, only she was the best, the sweetest child a mother ever had. Her father would get drunk, and he always got mad with me, with everybody when he was that way and me specially, and sometimes it seemed to me he would strike me in spite of all I could do. Then, that chiid, she would coax him so sweet, and rub his head and soothe him just like he was a baby, and when he'd drop off to sleep, then she'd come kiss me and say, 'Mamma, it's your time now. He's gone to sleep, now you lie down and let me rock the baby, and I'll sing so soft I won't wake any body, and then as soon as he's sleep I'll put him by you.'

"Sometimes I'd lie down, and then again I couldn't. It seemed like I couldn't leave that sweet child up and me lying down. Oh! She was my comfort! After awhile Josie she took sick, that was my second child, and she lay and moaned and moaned, and we couldn't break the fever at all, and after awhile she just got weaker and weaker and one day she just shut her eyes and died. Then Bill he did better, and I thought a better day was coming for us all, for he didn't drink, and it seemed as if the child's death had changed him. But it wasn't long afore Bill, he taken to whisky again, and for a time he drank worse than ever. Then Nannie she'd go off all to herself and pray. I knew what she went for, though she never said; for when she'd come again, her face would shine so bright.

"She belonged to the Infant class of the Sunday School of the Mission Church and she loved the teacher to devotion. Nothing, rain nor nothing would keep her from Sunday School, though we lived two miles away. Often that child would go without a mouthful of breakfast, for we hadn't anything to eat in the house, a great deal of the time, for Bill would drink up his wages, Saturday night, and so we would have nothing, unless somebody would send us a little something, and that wasn't every time. Many and many a time has that child gone in her poor little faded calico, and little straw hat, that somebody was good enough to give her, and walked that two miles, and my heart would ache to know that she had had but little supper the night before and not one bit of breakfast! But she had a brave little heart and without one murmur, she would kiss baby and me and go.

"I heard the other day, and how it did make my heart hurt me, that some of them rich children would tuck their fine dresses close, to keep their clothes from touching hern and how they wouldn't walk with her when they marched out of the church two and two to the infant class-room. But the teacher she always took my poor little child by her hand herself. Oh! she was a good woman and I thank her from my heart. I'll be bound Nannie always know'd her lesson the best of all. Her teacher told me herself she never took her blue eyes off her while she talked.

"One Saturday, ah! it was a sad day, the saddest Saturday I ever expect to see, the child had learned her verse for next day and it was this one, 'Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God.' I know the verse because she kept saying it over and over, till I learned it, too. Just as she had finished learning her lesson, her Uncle Jeff came by with his team. He stopped and talked awhile, and asked how Bill was comin' on, but I couldn't say for certain, for Bill hadn't come home yet, so Jeff, he called to Nannie and said: 'Don't you want to ride over to my house, Nannie?' But she said: 'I'd like to go, Uncle Jeff, only you know I couldn't stay; I can't leave mamma, and to-morrow is Sunday and I can't miss Sunday School.'

"So Jeff, he is always good and kind, and he said,'Well, come jump in the wagon, I'll give you a little drive around and bring you back home.'

"She jumped in, so glad of a little ride, and she took her seat, as he told her, at the back on a plank laid across the top, for it was a big open wagon without any seat. Jeff stood talking to me and playing with baby in my arms, while Nannie sat in the wagon so happy. Presently she started to sing out there in the road, and these were the words, I remember them well:

'Am I a soldier of the Cross,
A follower of the Lamb?'

"Then she sat singing away, for she know'd these words and loved 'em, too, and Jeff he said, 'Good-by,' and jumped in the wagon in front, flourished his whip with a big crack—the horses gave a bound, and—"

The poor woman, who had been weeping all the time, here buried her head in her lap, and sobbed out loud. In a moment she raised her streaming eyes, and went on:

"They started off—she fell back out on the hard ground—and—broke her neck! Oh! she never smiled, she never spoke one word to me, but she died, died, died! Oh, that Saturday night! My husband drunk! My Nannie dead on the bed close beside me, and me alone! I tried to die, too, but I couldn't. Oh! how I did want to die and go to Nannie. I didn't think of Jesus. I almost cursed God there on that dark night all alone, for taking my child. Oh! I did curse the day that brought me into this miserable world. I walked the floor; wailed out loud and tore my hair; I took my dear child in my arms and rubbed her cold, stiff hands, and kissed her white lips but Bill he slept on and did not wake til Jeff brought a coffin and we put Nannie in.

"I heard that the next day in Sunday School the teacher of the class said: 'Can anybody tell where Nannie Freeman is? Ah! Nannie, my Nannie, was in heaven The 'pure in heart' was with her God!

"Monday, Bill was sober enough, and was sorry for him, he was so wretched, he was just ready to kill hisself for his cruelty. We sent for the minister. Jeff had to go home, and we went to the grave-yard the minister, Bill, and me, and we buried my Nannie. Oh! I thought it would kill me to leave that grave. I couldn't help it I threw myself on the heap of earth and cried, 'Oh! Nannie, my darling, my comfort, my angel, come back!' I know'd she couldn't come. Oh! I know'd it, but couldn't help it; it seemed my heart would burst with such tears as it was so full of Oh! ma'am, grief don't kill anybody; never does, or it would have killed me long ago."

The woman was choked with weeping Mrs. Somers wept silently, but Annie, seemed the very flood-gates of her pent-up heart had burst apart, for a tide of tears came rushing through. She mourned for the poor woman, but then there came, besides, the remembrance of a time when she too, wept over a dead child, and that child had had a drunken father! The two pictures side by side stood out before her in bold relief, and she wept so hysterically that Mrs. Somers, after a short prayer, bade the afflicted woman good-by, and drew Annie away. But she would not go till she had pressed the warmest kiss upon the surprised woman's lips, while the tears still rained down her cheeks.

They walked down on the river's bank and as they stood a moment before parting Mrs. Somers said: "My dear child, forgive me for carrying you there. I forgot. You must not go there any more."

"Oh! yes, Mrs. Somers, that is the place for me. That poor woman is my sister in affliction, for our cases were similar, though very dissimilar. That is the place for me, but I am sorry I could control myself better. I thought I was strong to bear, but I am only human after all!"

"Dear child, my heart yearns over you, and I did not know which mother claimed the most of my sympathy, you or Nannie's mother. Somehow you feel like my own dear child. I do not know why exactly, but it is so."

"I am so glad to hear you speak so. Will let me be your child, your child to pray for, to keep from wandering, to watch, to counsel, to guide."

S., Cornell, Neb. 1. Why were the Israelites called Hebrews? 2. Where can I procure a paper published in the interest of the Salvation army?

According to Augustine and Ambrose, the name Hebrew is derived from Abram, (taking the form Abræi). The, Bible, however tells us that Eber or Heber the ancestor of Abram was the name—father of the sons of Eber (Gen. 10: 25 and Numbers 24: 24 and Gen. 14: 13. 2. Inquirer, N. Y. 1. Was George Washington a Protestant? 2. Are Joan of Arc and Joan the Maid of Orleans the same? 3. What Joan became a Pope for six months?

Yes; Episcopalian. 2. Yes. 3. According to Anastasius and a few other writers, Joan was the name of a female pope who occupied the chair of St. Peter, between the pontificates of Leo IV. and Benedict III about the years 855. Other and more recognized writers declare the story of Joan to be mythical and that the manuscript found among Anastasius' writings was an interpolation.

Earnest Inquirer, Denison, I.. Many are teaching that there is no hell, and others that "forever" does not mean everlasting punishment. What is the truth?

It should be sufficient to know that the Bible holds out no hope to those who die unrepentant. If a man rejects Christ, or fails to avail himself of his redemption, he incurs the penalty appointed, whatever that may be. It is described in the Bible by many symbols, such as "everlasting fire," "the second death," etc, it is useless to speculate as to its character or duration. The plain practical duty is to avoid it by faith in Christ and by right living.

Mrs. J. A. Long, music teacher, Sappington, Mo., writes:

"The exquisitely beautiful hymns contained in Gospel Hymns Nos. 1 to 6 Complete (one of your premium offers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), gave me a foretaste of heaven. Among the vast army of redeemed, marching heavenward, thousands upon thousands have been, are, and will be, strengthened, cheered, guided, and sustained, by the out-pourings of Christian hearts contained in this book. Sweet Fanny Crosby, will have indeed a jewelry crown to lay at her Master's feet. God bless her."

Reader. Suppose a person owning property has an agent who carries on all the business. The owner (inheriting the property), finds that it has not been taxed since it came into said owner's possession—the assessor knowing nothing about the property. What is the duty of this property-owner as a Christian?

It is duty, both on conscientious grounds and as a matter of business, is to ascertain, as soon as possible, whether there are any arrears of taxes chargeable against the property. This can readily do from the assessor. If there are they should be paid; otherwise the property is in danger of being sold for taxes, in which case it would cost more to redeem it, than to pay the taxes outright.

J. Rockton, N. Y. What are the chief points of difference between Calvinists and Arminians?

Volumes would be required to give a full statement of them. The controversy has called forth thousands of learned treatises. Roughly stated, however, they may be summarized thus: The cardinal distinction as to predestination. Calvin held that God, by eternal decree, chose out of among men a definite and limited number of men, wholly apart from any merit in themselves, should be saved, and left the remainder to undergo the punishment consequent on their sin. The chosen ones were brought to repentance and faith by the influence of the Holy Spirit and the others did not have the same influence. Arminius denied this and contended that all had an equal opportunity. Thus election, according to Calvin, came from election, while according to Arminius, election was the result of holiness. You will see that these men occupying these respective standpoints would take different views as to many other doctrines.

J. H. Carruth, Houston, Tex., writes as follows concerning the probable date of our Saviour's birth:

"We read in Exodus, 12th chapter, that the Jewish ecclesiastical year began about the time of the vernal equinox or the 20th of March. We read in 1. Chron. 24th chapter, that twenty-four courses of priests were appointed to superintend the offerings and sacrifices. The courses took their names from those first appointed and their names are all given. The duties of each lasted half a month. Abijah was the eighth of the twenty-four men first appointed. In the New Testament he is called Abia. Zacharias was of the course of Abia. His work must have ceased about the 20th of July. It was "after this" and probably soon after that Elizabeth his wife conceived, and according to Luke, Jesus was born about fifteen months later, which would bring it about the 20th of October. This would be so, if the year began uniformly on the 20th of March. But we are told that the months of the Jews were lunar months beginning with each new moon. Consequently the year did not begin uniformly on the 20th of March, but on the new moon that comes near to it, before or after. For this reason as well as for another we cannot fix the day at the 20th of October, but it is highly probable that it was within two weeks of that time, before or after.

Subscriber, Rosedale, Kans. A Catholic priest tells me that Baptism by sprinkling was first introduced in about the second century, and its object was the conferring of eternal life on infants. Is that so?

It is a disputed point whether sprinkling or pouring was practised before this. Baptists contend that the Apostles baptized by immersion and in no other way, but other sects dispute the statement. The Roman Catholic theory is that baptism relieves the infant of the results of original sin and makes it a member of Christ's Church. It is thus an initiation, but as the infant grows to years of discretion, other duties and ceremonies are demanded of him by the Catholic church as essentials to salvation.

George W. Harris, Yorkville, Ill. Is it possible to bring about a union of Protestant sects? Does not Ephesians 4: 5 indicate that there can be no real union, while some practice immersion and some sprinkling under the name of baptism?

We doubt whether it is possible to bring about a union of the sects. Few people are sanguine enough to hope for that. What is possible, is union in Christian work. In small towns, in benevolent work, in the evangelization of Christless neighborhoods and in the Foreign mission field the sects might work together with advantage, while maintaining a separate organization. Much money might be saved by combining forces and there would be no detriment. Baptism need not be an insurmountable obstacle. In a union church, the mode might be left optional with the candidate Or, if immersion were made the rule in a church, the believer in sprinkling might submit to immersion as a concession to his brethren, who attach importance to the mode.

AN IMMANENT GOD.*

THE time is rapidly approaching when the presence of an unseen God in the universe will be accepted on the same ground as the presence of an unseen soul in man. The latter cannot be proved by a mathematical demonstration, nor by the rules of logic. We judge man to have a soul by what it does in and through the body. By a parity of reasoning we must judge that the universe has a soul. We see the same evidence as in the human body of a Will working in and through it, a conscious Being who feels, loves, plans, and executes.

How can we do otherwise than describe as a spiritual age the era in which the truth breaks in upon the consciousness of the race that what have been regarded as material forces are really spiritual forces; when it even begins to be surmised that matter itself has a spiritual origin? It is a day of wonderful revelations and strange reconciliations. The most significant of these reconciliations, that which in a sense includes all others, is the new and thrice-blessed union and fellowship of science and religion. Theology has heretofore looked upon science as an enemy of religion; as if religion were a tender lamb, and science a fierce wolf ready and anxious to pounce upon it and destroy it. How rapidly is this feeling passing away! It would not fully express the truth to say that the former antagonism has disappeared. In place of antagonism and fear has come a recognition of the truth that science is furnishing the most effective arguments and weapons of defense the Christian faith has ever gained outside of the sacred Scriptures. That all scientists and all friends of Christianity do not yet realize this in no wise affects the truth itself. That some do not yet see the laws of nature as the laws of God proves nothing but the limitation of their own vision. They are shut in by a self-created horizon.

In substituting an immanent God for an external God, science has rendered a supreme service to mankind. It gives a basis of order and system in the moral world, as the theory of Copernicus gave order and system in the physical universe. It marks the beginning of a new epoch in the religious history of the race as truly as the Copernican theory revolutionized astronomy. In point of fact, the great religious movement of the new age was initiated by science and not by theology. Copernicus was as necessary a forerunner of Calvin and Luther as of Kepler and Newton. A correct idea of the physical universe was essential to a true conception of God in the universe. The progress of science since that time has been gradual, but no more so than the evolution of religious thought. Neither Copernicus nor Calvin spoke the final word. The former revealed to mankind an orderly universe. The latter exalted God as its Sovereign Ruler. If Calvin's God appears to us too arbitrary, it must be remembered that he only reflected the spirit of the times in which he lived and wrought. No other conception would have suited that rude and tyrannical age. Since that period religion and science have worked side by side at the great problem of Divine Providence, or God's relation to his creation and his creatures. Although apparently antagonistic, they were, in reality, working toward the same end, each having a different but equally essential phase of the problem to solve.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitute. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

A Life Saved by a Hymn.

WHILE laboring as missionary in India, Rev. E. P. Scott observed a wild-looking man upon the street. He made inquiry and found that the uncouth individual was a member of one of the inland tribes that lived away in the mountain districts, and came down once a year to trade. He found the Gospel had never been preached to them, and that it was very hazardous to venture among them, because of their murderous propensities. He was stirred with an earnest desire to break to them the Bread of Life, so he packed his valise, took his violin (with which he was accustomed to sing), and started in the direction of the mountains. For two days he travelled, scarcely meeting a human being, until at last he found himself in the mountains and suddenly surrounded by a crowd of savages. Every spear was pointed at his heart. He expected that moment would be his last. Not knowing of any other resource, he tried the power of singing the name of Jesus to them. Drawing forth his violin, he began with closed eyes to sing and to play, "All hail the power of Jesus' name!" Being afraid to open his eyes, he sang on till the third verse, and while singing the stanza, "Let every kindred, every tribe," he opened his eyes to see what they were going to do, when lo! the spears had dropped from their hands, and the big tears were falling from their eyes! They invited him to their homes, and he spent two and a half years among them. His labors were so richly rewarded that when he was compelled to leave them because of impaired health, and return to his native country, they followed him for thirty miles. "O missionary," they said, "come back to us again!" These are tribes beyond that never heard the Gospel. He could not resist their entreaties. After a short absence, he went back again to his labors, which he continued among them until his death.

USEFUL FORMOSAN CHRISTIANS.

Not long ago a fire broke out in a Formosan village, and two houses were soon wrapped in flames. One of them was saved, the house of a heathen Chinaman; the owner of the other house is a Christian who happened to be away from home, and as nobody tried to save his house, it was burned down. There was a great laughter among the villagers at the Christian's misfortune. "That is the worth of your religion," they said to him. A day or two after a company of men were seen coming across the fields, and when they got near it was seen that they were laden with wood, tools and articles of furniture. The village was astir. What was it? Who were the men? They were the members of the church to which their Christian neighbor belonged, and had come from their homes, some miles away, to rebuild his house, which they did, while the villagers gaped with wonder. Nothing like it had ever been seen, in that part of the globe before.

WAITING FOR THE GOSPEL.

Here is a touching incident in the life of a Christian missionary in South America:

"Tell me," asked a young Spaniard at Buenos Ayres, "are there no Christians in North America?" "Yes," answered the missionary, "hundreds of thousands." "Then," with a most sad face, he continued, "Why do they not come out here? Do you know that Buenos Ayres is so ready for the Gospel that you have only to announce a meeting, and the people crowd in until there is not room to stand?" How such a question goes to the heart of the sincere Christian! Such a simple, direct appeal should have a ready response.

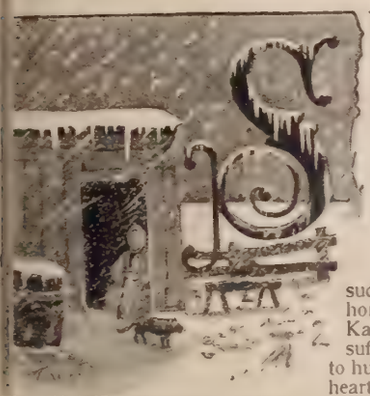
ALL EAGER TO HELP THE WEST.

Thousands of God's People, in many States, Coming Nobly to the Relief of the Suffering Farmers of Kansas and Nebraska—Quick Succor Afforded—The Fund Growing.



SYMPATHY with the sufferings of the destitute thousands in Kansas and Nebraska has touched the hearts of their brothers and sisters throughout the land. It is not the sympathy that expends itself in mere words, but it takes the practical form of speedy and substantial aid. Every mail received at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears a host of white-winged missives from those who feel it to be one of the highest joys of this life to be able to help others in distress, and who well remember the promise: "He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack." (Prov. 28: 27). If these gifts, that carry succor and comfort to the cold and cheerless homes on the sterile plains of Nebraska and Kansas, are the cause of tears being dried and sufferings lessened and lives saved, a great good to humanity will have been accomplished, and the hearts of thousands will be filled with an overwhelming gratitude to the benevolent givers, and their souls led to a firmer trust in the Divine Father, who careth for all his children. These are the feelings that are expressed in many of the letters already received from families who have been aided in the darkest hours of their misery.

During the week, the Relief Fund has grown to considerable proportions, as the acknowledgments of another issue will show, and a large number of packages of clothing, etc., have been received at the Central Relief Depot, established by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at 740-742 Broadway, New York, for free transportation to the sufferers. But the extent of the work to be done is so great that it will require the co-operation of all friends of Christian benevolence. From Kansas letters of urgent appeal have come from different points in Cheyenne, Sherman, Wallace, Greeley, Wichita, Rawlins, Logan, Scott, Garfield, Ford, and other counties, and in Nebraska, from Keith, Dawson, Boyd, Buffalo, Hitchcock, Perkins, Lincoln, Chase, Hayes, Frontier, Dundy, and others, besides many localities in Texas, South Dakota and Oklahoma.

No relief movement was ever urged forward with greater zeal or expedition, this being largely due to the promptness with which the readers of this journal responded to the appeal and the cheerful alacrity of the Distributors in tendering their services for the work. Quick relief meant the saving of hundreds of precious lives. Our corps of over three hundred Volunteer Distributors have for two weeks past been busily relieving large numbers of families in those districts which are the Centres of the Most Aggravated Suffering.

Another instalment of $3000 was forwarded to them during the week by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to carry forward the work. This, too, in addition to large quantities of clothing, etc., which have already gone forward, and been distributed.

Many of the workers in the field, in the intervals of their consecrated labor (for they receive no pecuniary reward), find opportunity to write us of the progress of the distribution. On every side they are met by a multitude of pressing appeals for food and clothing. The pictures of poverty and suffering given in their letters would move the stoniest heart. All the barriers of hesitancy have been broken down; for, to crown a long season of want and misery, there has now come the dreaded Western winter, with its accompaniments of cold and starvation, which none may withstand. With children hungry and half naked; with cattle perishing for lack of feed; with neither food nor fuel in their homes, it is little wonder that the cry of distress, wrung from has been so loud and long, that it has been heard across a continent.

Writing from Lincoln, Neb., a correspondent of the New York "Times" fully corroborates the statements of suffering contained in the letters that have reached us. In Logan County, a recent canvas showed three hundred and fifty-seven cases of destitution. The farmers around North Platte are "unable to give a meal or even to sell one." Hundreds of people are living on flour and water, and have not sufficient clothes to cover them. In Hitchcock and Dundy Counties between four hundred and five hundred people have abandoned their holdings and moved away. Gov. Crounse has appointed a State Relief Committee with Rev. Luther P. Ludden as manager. Outside help will be welcomed. Mr. Ludden estimates that between five thousand and seven thousand families (averaging five to a family), will require assistance until Spring, and this number may increase as winter advances. Thus over thirty thousand persons in Nebraska alone are practically destitute.

A calm and dispassionate statement of the situation in Nebraska comes from Rev. J. S. McPherson Pastor, M. E. Church, Hiawatha, Neb., who writes us as follows:

I desire to present to your readers some facts in regard to the situation that now prevails over this country. Many and oft have been the calls for help in certain localities; sometimes the districts were small and at others extensive. Sometimes only partial and at others total; but not since men crossed the Ohio have such conditions prevailed for extent and severity. A strip of country four hundred and fifty miles in width, stretching from the Rio Grande to Michigan and Minnesota; eighty percent of the cultivated acres, a desert of dust.

Mr. McPherson further adds that twenty per cent. of the population have gone from their homes in search of food and shelter. Many who are mere boys and girls have been driven from their homes to earn a living for the more dependent of the family. These are some of the general features that present themselves to the view. These are not the worst; a large percentage of the people have very little of this world's goods and very many have no friends upon whom they can rely for the necessaries of life.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage.

"ISLE OF PALMS."

Text: Isaiah 60 : 9, "The ships of Tarshish first."

THE Tarshish of my text by many commentators is supposed to be the island of Ceylon, upon which the seventh sermon of the "'Round-the-World" series lands us. Ceylon was called by the Romans Taprobane. John Milton called it "Golden Chersonese." Moderns have called Ceylon "The isle of Palms;" "The isle of Flowers;" "The Pearl-drop on the brow of India;" "The isle of Jewels;" "The island of spice;" "The show place of the Universe;" "The land of hyacinth and ruby." In my eyes, for scenery it appeared to be a mixture of Yosemite and Yellowstone Park. All Christian people want to know more of Ceylon for they have a long while been contributing for its evangelization. As our ship from Australia approached this island, there hovered over it clouds thick and black as the superstitions which have hovered here for centuries; but the morning sun was breaking through like the Gospel light which is to scatter the last cloud of moral gloom. The sea lay along the coast calm as the eternal purposes of God toward all islands and continents. We swing into the harbor of Colombo, which is made by a break-water built at vast expense. As we floated into it the water is black with boats of all sizes, and manned by people of all colors, but chiefly Tamils and Cingalese.

There are two things I want most to see on this island: a heathen temple with its devotees in idolatrous worship, and an audience of Cingalese addressed by a Christian missionary. The entomologist may have his capture of brilliant insects; and the sportsman his tent adorned with antler of red deer and tooth of wild boar; and the painter his portfolio of gorge three thousand feet down, and of days dying on evening pillows of purple cloud etched with fire; and the botanist his camp full of orchids, and crowfoots, and gentians, and valerian, and lotus. I want most to find out the moral and religious triumphs, how many wounds have been healed; how many sorrows comforted; how many entombed nations resurrected. Sir William Baker, the famous explorer and geographer, did well for Ceylon after his eight years' residence in this island, and Professor Ernst Heckel, the professor from Jena, did well when he swept these waters, and rummaged these hills, and took home for future inspection the insects of this tropical air. And forever honored be such work: but let all that is sweet in rhythm, and graphic on canvas, and imposing in monument, and immortal in memory be brought to tell the deeds of those who were heroes and heroines for Christ's sake.

Many scholars have supposed that this island of Ceylon was the original Garden of Eden where the snake first appeared on reptilian mission. There are reasons for belief that this was the site where the first homestead was opened and destroyed. It is so near the equator that there are not more than twelve degrees of Fahrenheit difference in the year round. Perpetual foliage, perpetual fruit, and all styles of animal life prosper. What luxuriance, and abundance, and superabundance of life! What styles of plumage do not the birds sport! What styles of scale do not the fishes reveal! What styles of song do not the groves have in their libretto! Here on the roadside and clear out on the beach of the sea stands the cocoanut tree, saying: "Take my leaves for shade. Take the juice of my fruit for delectable drink. Take my saccharine for sugar. Take my fibre for the cordage of your ships. Take my oil to kindle your lamps. Take my wood to fashion your cups and pitchers. Take my leaves to thatch your roofs. Take my smooth surface on which to print your books. Take my 30,000,000 trees covering 500,000 acres, and with the exportation enrich the world. I will wave in your fans, and spread abroad in your umbrellas. I will vibrate in your musical instruments. I will be the scrubbing brushes on your floors."

Here also stands the palm tree, saying: "I am at your disposal. With these arms, I fed your ancestors 150 years ago, and with these same arms I will feed your descendants 150 years from now. I defy the centuries!"

Here also stands the nutmeg tree, saying: "I am ready to spice your beverages, and enrich your puddings, and with my sweet dust make insipid things palatable."

Here also stands the coffee plant, saying: "With the liquid boiled from my berry I stimulate the nations morning by morning."

Here stands the tea plant, saying: "With the liquid boiled from my leaf I soothe the world's nerves, and stimulate the world's conversation, evening by evening."

Here stands the cinchona, saying: "I am the foe of malaria. In all climates my bitterness is the slaughter of fevers."

What miracles of productiveness on these islands! Enough sugar to sweeten all the world's beverages; enough bananas to pile all the world's fruit-baskets; enough rice to mix all the world's puddings; enough cocoanut to powder all the world's cakes; enough flowers to garland all the world's beauty.

But in the evening, riding through a cinnamon grove, I first tasted the leaves and bark of that condiment so valuable and delicate that transported on ships the aroma of the cinnamon is dispelled if placed near a rival bark. Of such great value is the cinnamon shrub that years ago those who injured it in Ceylon were put to death. But that which once was a jungle of cinnamon is now a park of gentlemen's residences. The long, white dwelling-houses are bounded with this shrub and all other styles of growth congregated there, make a botanical garden. Doves called cinnamon doves hop among the branches, and crows, more poetically styled ravens, which never could sing, but think they can, fly across the road giving full test of their vocables. Birds which learned their chanting under the very eaves of heaven overpower all with their grand march of the tropics. The hibiscus dapples the scene with its scarlet clusters. All shades of brown and emerald, and saffron, and brilliance; melons, limes, magnosteens, custard-apples, guavas, pine-apples, jessamine so laden with aroma they have to hold fast to the wall, and begonias, gloriosas on fire, and orchids so delicate other lands must keep them under conservatory, but here defiant of all weather, and flowers more or less akin to azaleas, and honeysuckles, and floxes, and fuchias, and chrysanthemums, and rhododendrons, and fox-gloves, and pansies, which dye the plains and mountains of Ceylon with heaven. The evening hour burns incense of all styles of aromatics. The convolvulus, blue as if the sky had fallen, and butterflies spangling the air, and arms of trees sleeved with blossoms, and rocks upholstered of moss, commingling sounds, and sights, and odors until eye, and ear, and nostril vie with each other as to which sense shall open the door to the most enchantment. A struggle between music, and perfume, and iridescence. Oleanders reeling in intoxication of color. Great banyan trees that have been changing their mind for centuries, each century carrying out a new plan of growth, attracted our attention, and saw us pass in the year of 1894, as they saw pass the generations of 1794, and 1694. Colombo is so thoroughly embowered in foliage that if you go into one of its towers and look down upon the city of one hundred and thirty thousand people you cannot see a house. Oh, the trees of Ceylon! May you live to behold the morning climbing down through their branches, or the evening tipping their leaves with amber and gold! I forgive the Buddhist for the worship of trees until they know of the God who made the trees. I wonder not that there are some trees in Ceylon called sacred. To me all trees are sacred. I wonder not that before one of them they burn camphor flowers, and hang lamps around its branches, and a hundred thousand people each year make pilgrimage to that tree. Worship something man must, and until he hear of the only Being worthy of worship, what so elevating as a tree! What glory enthroned amid its foliage! What a majestic doxology spreads out in its branches! What a voice when the tempests pass through it! How it looks down upon the cradle and the grave of centuries! As the fruit of one tree unlawfully eaten struck the race with woe, and the uplifting of another tree brings peace to the soul, let the woodman spare the tree, and all nations honor it, if, through higher teaching, we do not, like the Ceylonese, worship it! How consolatory that when we no more walk under the tree branches on earth, we may see the "Tree of life which bears twelve manner of fruits, and yields her fruit every month, and the leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations!"

Two processions I saw in Ceylon within one hour, the first led by a Hindoo priest, a huge pot of flowers on his head, his face disfigured with holy lacerations, and his unwashed followers beating as many discords from what are supposed to be musical instruments, as at one time can be induced to enter the human ear. The procession halted at the door of the huts. The occupants came out and made obeisance and presented small contributions. In return therefor the priest sprinkled ashes upon the children who came forward, this evidently a form of benediction. Then the procession led on by the priest started again; more noise, more ashes, more genuflection. However keen one's sense of the ludicrous, he could find nothing to excite even a smile in the movements of such a procession. Meaningless, oppressive, squalid, filthy, sad.

Returning to our carriage, we rode on for a few moments, and we came on another procession, a kindly lady leading groups of native children all clean, bright, happy, laughing. They were a Christian school out for exercise. There seemed as much intelligence, refinement and happiness in that regiment of young Cingalese, as you would find in the ranks of any young ladies' seminary being chaperoned on their afternoon walk through Central Park, New York, or Hyde Park, London. The Hindoo procession illustrated on a small scale something of what Hindooism can do for the world. The Christian procession illustrated on a smale scale something of what Christianity can do for the world. But those two processions were only fragments of two great processions ever marching across our world; the procession blasted of superstition and the procession blessed of Gospel light. I saw them in one afternoon in Ceylon. They are to be seen in all nations.

Nothing is of more thrilling interest than the Christian achievements in this island. The Episcopal Church was here the National Church, but disestablishment has taken place, and since Mr. Gladstone's accomplishment of that fact in 1880, all denominations are on equal platform, and all are doing mighty work. America is second to no other nation in what has been done for Ceylon. Since 1816 she has had her religious agents in the Jaffna Peninsula of Ceylon. The Spauldings, the Howlands, the Doctors Poor, the Saunders and others just as good and strong have been fighting back monsters of superstition and cruelty greater than any that ever swung the tusk or roared in the jungles.

The American missionaries, in Ceylon, have given special attention to medical instruction, and are doing wonders in driving back the horrors of heathen surgery. Cases of suffering were formerly given over to the devil-worshippers, and such tortures inflicted as may not be described. The patient was trampled by the feet of the medical attendants. It is only of God's mercy that there is a living mother in Ceylon. Oh, how much Ceylon needs doctors and the medical classes of native students under the care of those who follow the example of the late Samuel Fish Green are providing them, so that all the alleviations, and kindly ministries, and scientific acumen that can be found in American and English hospitals will soon bless all Ceylon. In that Island are 32 American schools, 210 Church of England schools, 234 Wesleyan schools, 234 Roman Catholic schools. Ah! the schools decide most everything. How suggestive the incident that came to me in Ceylon. In a school under the care of the Episcopal Church two boys were converted to Christ and were to be baptized. An intelligent Buddhist boy said in the school, "Let all the boys on Buddha's side come to this part of the room, and all the boys on Christ's side go to the other part of the room." All the boys except two went on Buddha's side, and when the two boys who were to be baptized were scoffed at and derided one of them yielded and retired to Buddha's side. But afterward that boy was sorry that he had yielded to the persecution, and when the day of baptism came, stood up beside the boy who remained firm. Some one said to the boy who had vacillated in his choice between Buddha and Christ "you are a coward, and not fit for either side," but he replied, "I was overcome of temptation, but I repent and believe." Then both the boys were baptized and from that time the Anglican Mission moved on more and more vigorously. I will not say which of all the denominations of Christians is doing the most for the evangelization of that island, but know this Ceylon will be taken for Christ! Sing Bishop Heber's hymn:

> What though the spicy breezes,
> Blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle!

Among the first places I visited was a Buddhist College, about one hundred men studying to become priests gathered around the teachers. Stepping into the building where the high-priest was instructing the class, we were apologetic and told him we were Americans, and would like to see his mode of teaching if he had no objections. Whereupon he began, doubled up as he was on a lounge, with his right hand playing with his foot. In his left hand he held a package of bamboo leaves on which were written the words of the lesson, each student holding a similar package of bamboo leaves. The high-priest first read and then one of his students read. A group of as fine formed young men as I ever saw surrounded the venerable instructor. The last word of each sentence was intoned. There was in the whole scene an earnestness which impressed me. Not able to understand a word of what was said, there is a look anguage and intonation that is the same mong all races. That the Buddhists have ull faith in their religion no one can doubt. hat is, in their opinion, the way to Heav-n. What Mohammed is to the Moham-edan, and what Christ is to the Christian, Buddha is to the Buddhist. We waited for pause in the recitation, and then express-g our thanks, retired.

Nearby is a Buddhist temple, on the al-r of which before the image of Buddha re offerings of flowers. As night was oming on we came up to a Hindoo temple. irst we were prohibited going farther han the outside steps, but we gradually dvanced until we could see all that was oing on inside. The worshippers were aking obeisance. The tom-toms were ildly beaten, and shrill pipes were blown, nd several other instruments were in full ang and blare, and there was an inde-cribable hubbub, and the most laborious tyle of worship I had ever seen or heard. he dim lights, and the jargon, and the looms, and the flitting figures mingled for ve and ear a horror which it is difficult to hake off. All this was only suggestive of hat would there transpire after the toilers f the day had ceased work and had time p appear at the temple. That such things hould be supposed to please the Lord, or ave any power to console or help the wor-hippers, is only another mystery in this orld of mysteries. But we came away addened with the spectacle, a sadness hich did not leave us until we arrived at a lace where a Christian missionary was reaching in the street to a group of natives.

I had that morning expressed a wish to witness such a scene, and here it was. tanding on an elevation the good man was ddressing the crowd. All was attention, nd silence, and reverence. A religion of elief and joy was being commended, and he dusky faces were illumined with the entiments of pacification and reinforce-hent. It was the rose of Sharon after walk-ng among nettles. It was the morning ght after a thick darkness. It was the Gospel after Hindooism.

But passing up and down the streets of Ceylon you find all styles of people within ve minutes: Afghans, Kaffirs, Portuguese, Moormen, Dutch, English, Scotch, Irish, American; all classes, all dialects, all man-ers and customs, all styles of salaam. The most interesting thing on earth is the human race, and specimens of all branches f it confront you in Ceylon. The island f the present is a quiet and inconspicuous ffair compared with what it once was. The ead cities of Ceylon were larger and more mposing than are the living cities. On this sland are dead New Yorks, and dead Pe-kins, and dead Edinburghs, and dead Lon-ons. Ever and anon at the stroke of the rchæologist's hammer the tomb of some reat municipality flies open, and there are ther buried cities that will yet respond to he explorer's pick-axe. The Pompeii and Herculaneum underneath Italy are small ompared with the Pompeiis and Hercula-eums underneath Ceylon. Yonder is an xhumed city which was founded five hun-ired years before Christ, standing in pomp nd splendor for twelve hundred years. Stairways up which fifty men might pass ide by side. Carved pillars, some of them allen, some of them aslant, some of them rect. Phidiases and Christopher Wrens never heard of, here performed the marvels f sculpture and architecture. Aisles through which royal processions marched. Arches nder which kings were carried. City with eservoir twenty miles in circumference. Extemporized lakes that did their cooling nd refreshing for twelve centuries. Ruins nore suggestive than Melrose and Kenil-worth. Ceylonian Karnaks and Luxors. Ruins retaining much of grandeur, though ears bombarded them and Time put his hisel on every block, and more than all, veg-tation put its anchors, and pries, and wrenches in all the crevices. Dagobas, or places where relics of saints or deities are kept. Dagobas four hundred feet high, and their fallen material burying precious things for the sight of which modern curiosity has digged and blasted in vain. Procession of elephants in imitation, wrought into lustrous marble. Troops of horses in full run. Shrines, chapels, cathedrals wrecked on the mountain side. Stairs of moon-stone. Exquisite scrolls rolling up more mysteries than will ever be unrolled. Over sixteen square miles, the ruins of one city strewn. Throne rooms on which at different times sat one hundred and sixty-five kings, reigning in authority they inherited. Walls that witnessed coronations, assassinations, subjugations, triumphs. Altars at which millions bowed ages before the orchestras celestial woke the Shepherds with midnight overture.

When Lieutenant Skinner, in 1832, discovered the site of some of these cities, he found congregated in them undisturbed assemblages of leopards, porcupines, flamingoes and pelicans; reptiles sunning themselves on the altars; prima-donnas rendering ornithological chant from deserted music halls. One king restored much of the grandeur; rebuilt fifteen hundred residences, but ruin soon resumed its sceptre. But all is down; the spires down; the glory of splendid arches down. What killed those cities? Who slew the New York and London of the year 500 B.C.? Was it unhealthed with a host of plagues? Was it foreign armies laying seige? Was it whole generations weakened by their own vices? Mystery sits amid the monoliths and brick dust. Finger on lip in eternal silence while the centuries guess and guess in vain. We simply know that genius planned those cities, and immense populations inhabited them. An eminent writer estimates that a pile of bricks in one ruin of Ceylon would be enough to build a wall ten feet high from Edinburgh to London. 1600 pillars with carved capitals are standing sentinel for ten miles. You can judge somewhat of the size of the cities by the reservoirs that were required to slake their thirst; judging the size of the city from the size of the cup out of which it drank. Cities crowded with inhabitants: not like American or English cities, but packed together as only barbaric tribes can pack them. But their knell was sounded; their light went out. Giant trees are the only royal family now occupying those palaces. The growl of wild beasts, where once the guffaw of wassail ascended. Anuradhapura and Pollonarna will never be rebuilded. Let all the living cities of the earth take warning. Cities are human, having a time to be born and a time to die. No more certainly have they a cradle than a grave. A last judgment is appointed for individuals, but cities have their last judgment in this world. They bless, they curse, they worship, they blaspheme, they suffer, they are rewarded, they are overthrown.

Preposterous! says some one, to think that any of our American or European cities which have stood so long can ever come through vice to extinction. But New York and London have not stood as long as those Ceylonese cities stood. Where is the throne outside of Ceylon on which one hundred and sixty-five successive kings reigned for a life-time? Cities and nations that have lived far longer than our present cities, or nation, have been sepulchred. Let all the great municipalities of this and other lands ponder. It is as true now as when the Psalmist wrote it, and as true of cities and nations as of individuals: "The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous; but the way of the ungodly shall perish."

LED TO CHRIST BY A SINGLE VERSE.

An interesting incident is related of the early spiritual experience of the Bishop of Liverpool, by Rev. Canon Christopher, an English clergyman of distinction. Many years ago, on one Sunday evening, there came into an Oxford parish church the steps of a stalwart undergraduate, one of the university cricket eleven, one who shortly afterwards gained a first-class in the Honor School. It happened that evening that a stranger clergyman read prayers, whose name the undergraduate never heard. He read the second chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians as the second lesson. He read the eighth verse with a slight pause between each two clauses, as if to fix attention on one truth at a time, 'By grace ye are saved—through faith—and that not of yourselves—it is the gift of God." That verse so read was used of God to teach that undergraduate the truth. It is not too much to say that the great usefulness of the long life of that Oxford man, and of his numerous writings, his 'Expository Thoughts on the Gospels,' his 'Christian Leaders of the Last Century,' his numberless faithful Gospel tracts, his forcible addresses and episcopal charges, may be traced back to the work of the Holy Spirit in his mind and heart by means of that single verse of his Word."

"THE FOUNTAIN OF LIFE."

A father—an attorney at law, and the most patient and faithful Sabbath School superintendent the writer ever knew—lay dying. He had gone thither hoping to regain his health, and return to bless his loving family. From a Christian gentleman by his bedside he begged "a cup of cold water," and as the man gave it to him he repeated these comforting words, "And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away;" and then he bent his ear to catch the faint whisper of the dying father, who said, "Ah, I was just thinking, if this water was so refreshing, what will it be to drink of the fountain of life," and he passed to its realizations beyond the skies.

BABYLON'S HANGING GARDENS.

THE origin of Babylon is lost in the obscurity of ancient times. Herodotus tells us nothing of its founder, but says it was the most celebrated city of Assyria, and that it was fifty miles in circumference, its walls 350 feet high and 87 feet thick. Babylon was built in the middle of a vast plain, and the hanging gardens were constructed by the king to gratify his wife, Amytis, a native of Media.

These gardens contained a square of above 400 feet on each side, and were carried up in the manner of several large terraces one above the other, till the height equaled that of the walls of the city. The ascent from terrace to terrace was by stairs ten feet wide. Large trees were planted, and every description of plants and flowers till the whole was one vast pleasure garden. Above was trellis work, bearing

> The rarest kinds of fruits and flowers from every clime,
> Flowers abounded and in perfect prime.

Nebuchadnezzar spared neither expense nor pains to please his Median bride, for no less than 200,000 slaves were employed in the construction of these gardens, to reconcile his wife to the barren appearance of Babylon; and thus she ceased regretting the hills and forests she formerly delighted in.

The different terraces and groves contained fountains, parterres, seats and banqueting rooms; and combined the minute beauties of flowers and foliage with the largest known specimens of flora extant, till it was known as a paradise on earth.

The motive power that prompted all this trouble and expense was love of the Queen—mightier far

> Than strength of nerve or sinew, or the sway
> Of magic, potent over sun and star.

We have a grander example of its power in "the love of Christ which passeth knowledge." "He loved the Church and gave himself for it." He who was "God over all blessed for evermore," gave himself for us, the sons of men. 'Tis true that

> Love, like death, levels all ranks,
> And lays the shepherd's crook beside the sceptre.

Love! Who shall describe it? A volume in a word! An ocean in a tear! A whirlwind in a sigh! But by far more wondrous is the love of Christ, and as the Bride of the Lamb, we shall know his changeless, everlasting love through all eternity.

A WORD FITLY SPOKEN.

In his early life the late James Haldane commanded a man-of-war the "Melville Castle." Once, when engaged in an action, he ordered up a fresh set of hands to take the place of those who had been killed by the broadside of the enemy. The men, seeing the mangled bodies of their comrades, instinctively drew back; at which he poured forth a volley of oaths and wished them all in hell. A religious seaman shortly said to him respectfully and seriously, "If God had answered your prayer just now, where would you have been?" His words were winged by him who never smites in vain, and from that day the captain became a changed man. He lived to preach the Gospel fifty-four years. His brother Robert, known as an able and learned commentator, was early converted under his preaching. Robert went to Geneva: and while there a number of young men were converted under his labors among whom were Felix Neff, the devoted young pastor of the High Alps; Merle D'Aubigne, the historian of the Reformation, and Frederick Monod, one of the pillars of the Evangelical Church in France. Who can gather up the results of that one conversion on board the "Melville Castle," brought about through a single sentence addressed by a sailor to his profane commander?

THE GREAT CONFESSION.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 27. Matt. 16: 13-28. Golden Text Matt. 16: 16. By Mrs. Baxter.

IT was not only the multitude which after the miracle of the loaves wrought even a second time, could ask Jesus such a question as: "What then dost thou for a sign, that we may see, and believe thee?" The Pharisees and Sadducees also "came, and tempting him asked him to shew them a sign from heaven." He "sighed deeply in his Spirit;" He had told them earthly things, and shewn them signs in earthly necessities, and they believed not; how should they believe if he told them of heavenly things? The precious days of his ministry were passing quickly away, but how little seemed to be accomplished! John the Baptist, who had understood and borne witness to him, had been beheaded; who was there now that recognized him as the Messiah? He answered the Pharisees: "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and then shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of Jonah.

Sad with the unbelief of the multitude, and of the Pharisees and Sadducees, he turned to his disciples: would they believe? He charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod." But the thoughts of the disciples were not running in the line of their Master's thoughts, they and instead of asking him for an explanation, "they reasoned among themselves;" darkness with darkness, instead of coming to the Light. They came to the conclusion that Jesus was referring to the fact that they had forgotten to take bread! "And Jesus perceiving it saith unto them, Why reason ye, because ye have no bread? Do ye not yet perceive, neither understand? Have ye your heart hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember when I brake the five loaves among the five thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces ye took up? They say unto him, Twelve. And when the seven among the four thousands, how many basketfuls of broken pieces took ye up? And they say unto him, Seven. And he said unto them, Do ye not yet understand?

And yet he did not lose patience with them; they were his chosen ones, and he should at last succeed in training them for his purposes; they had been given to him by his Father: He went forth, still accompanied by them "into the villages of Cæsarea Philippi." He had discharged the burden of his soul upon his Father, and with an opened ear, he learned that the time was come when he might bring his chosen twelve to a test of their faith in him. Nothing seemed to lead up to it. His recent intercourse with them had been disappointing and perhaps they never had seemed so far off from understanding him. But his Father's direction was unerring, and never could lead him astray. In his quiet confidence in his Father he asked his disciples when "he was alone," praying, "Who do men say that the Son of man is? And they said, Some say John the Baptist; some, Elijah; and others, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. He saith unto them, But who say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

Peter had understood, as little as the other apostles, the miracle of the loaves, but one incident had happened in which his faith had been manifested. When Jesus had come to his disciples, walking on the water, during the storm on the lake, and had quelled their unbelieving fears by the words, "It is I, be not afraid," Peter had immediately answered: "Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee upon the water." True, his faith had failed him when he saw the winds and the waves, but there was, in his stepping out upon the water, a faith in the miraculous power of Christ which the others did not evince. When his brother Andrew, a former convert of John the Baptist, sought out Peter, it was with the words, "We have found the Messiah," and Peter allowed himself forthwith to be led to Jesus. Peter had made no difficulty; as soon as he saw good reason for believing he believed. And, inconsistent as he was very often, and untrue to this, his first faith, he never abandoned it. Christ was the Messiah, the annointed of God, and his own succumbing to the spirit of unbelief around him did not uproot his first faith, and thus he could say without a doubt, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

At such a moment, in the midst of such unbelief where he had least reason to expect it, this confession of faith by Peter was an intense joy to the Lord. When he had first seen him, Jesus had said to Peter, "Thou art Simon, the son of Jona: thou shalt be called, Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone;" He gave him in token of what he should become. And now he repeats it, and blesses him: Blessed art thou Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it." Peter, when he first came to him, had grasped the truth through Andrew and John the Baptist, that Christ was the Messiah, but now it had come in a deeper way, by revelation from heaven, it had got hold of him and possessed him, that Jesus, the Messiah was indeed the Son of the living God. Perhaps Peter, who had had faith to walk on the water, felt more deeply and personally than the other disciples the stern rebuke of Jesus, when the disciples considered not the miracles of the loaves, "Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember?" Probably Peter had humbled himself, and was prepared to get, straight from heaven, right into the depth of his being, into "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible," the precious truth, which, up till now had attained only his understanding. There are many children of God who stop short of getting things

Direct From God.

They listen to, and adopt, spiritual ideas from others, and repeat them as though they were their own; but, unless a truth has come to us direct from above, it cannot, and does not, bring more of God into our own life, or more of real power into our service to others. Peter had got it from above, but now he was in a position to learn truths which would be strangely unwelcome to him in his present condition. No sooner does a truth of God lay hold of us than we are put to the proof as never before. First Jesus says to him, "Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my church"—not establish my kingdom—"and the gates of Hades"—not the Roman power—"shall not prevail against it." John the Baptist had preached the kingdom; Jesus himself had preached "the Gospel of the kingdom," after having preached over again John the Baptist's message, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Had he now abandoned the kindom in the interests of the church? What did he mean? Such thoughts may have stirred the mind of Peter. But Jesus adds, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." A kingdom in which heaven and earth should be so closely united as to be one in judgment, a power to bind and loose on earth which should be endorsed in heaven—how utterly different was this announcement to the conceptions of Peter and all the apostles which were gathered from the Scriptures which speak of Christ's millennial reign on earth.

Oh, the humiliation, Oh, the suffering; Oh, the blessedness of unlearning our human conceptions, to make room for the thoughts and purposes of our God! First, the disciples must know that the revelation of God to Peter was not yet to be made public. After the pouring out of the Holy Spirit things would be ripe, and the same Peter, who is now to keep silence regarding it would yet be the mouthpiece of the Holy Ghost to say, "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

BETWEEN this lesson and that of last week there was an interval which should not be overlooked. It occupied several weeks and when we consider how short Christ's ministry was, and how brief the records of it are, such periods are of importance. He appears to have been at Capernaum or its neighborhood when a company of his inveterate foes, the Scribes and Pharisees came about him. They seem to have made allies of their opponents the Sadducees with whom they had nothing in common but dislike of Jesus. Their first ground of criticism was that the disciples of Jesus omitted the ceremonial washing of the hands before meals. The charge was not denied, so we may conclude that the disciples were really becoming indifferent to the ceremonial laws. Christ's teaching would naturally have that effect. He directed their attention to heart-cleansing as being the one essential thing. In all times of religious movement this difference between men is observed. There are some who seek vital religion and others who shrink from it, but try to make up for it by giving undue stress to outward observances, which is a much easier matter. In our own day the Roman Catholic church has many adherents who act on that principle. They think much of the mode of baptism, are particular about being early at mass, and would be horrified at the thought of eating meat on Friday, yet are not concerned about leading an immoral life. Jesus gave the critics a sharp rebuke and left them. He must have foreseen at this time that his enemies would soon end his life and he was anxious to have some time in privacy for the instruction of his disciples, that they might carry on his work after his death. He accordingly went with them to the semi-heathen region of Phœnicia on the northwest of Palestine and stayed in the neighborhood of the seaports of Tyre and Sidon. He speedily left that region, crossed the Sea of Galilee again and went into the Decapolis country. There, too, he was known and the crowds followed him. Some of them would not go home, even for food, and again he worked a miracle to feed them. There were four thousand in this case and the provision was as bountiful as in the former case of five thousand. Afterward, Jesus appears to have returned to Magdala and Capernaum. Thence he made that journey to Jerusalem which John describes (7: 2—10: 21). On his return, or on the way, the conversation occurred which forms the subject of the lesson. Christ asks his disciples plainly what they think of him. Peter, prompt as usual, answers for himself and the others, without hesitation or circumlocution. Peter's reply marks a turning point in the life of the Apostles. Christ, now that he was recognized by them, could teach them higher truths. He could proceed to build his church on the foundation of Peter's statement. And the church still stands upon it. Christianity is not a philosophy, although it is philosophic. It is not a system of morality, although it requires morality. It is a religion of life based on "the Christ, the Son of the living God."

I will build my Church. A great preacher says: Christ builds on through all the ages. For the present, there has to be much destructive as well as constructive work done. Many a wretched hovel, the abode of sorrow and want, many a den of infamy, many a palace of pride, many a temple of idols will have to be pulled down yet, and men's eyes will be blinded by the dust, and their hearts will ache as they look at the ruins. Be it so. The finished structure will obliterate the remembrance of poor buildings that once cumbered its site. This King of ours will boast of the world as Augustus boasted of Rome, that he found it of brick and left it of marble.

The gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Sometimes when the infidel and the blasphemer are most rampant, and when professed friends are indifferent, it seems as if the church would fall, but Christ gives the promise that the gates of hell (meaning the designs, from the fact that plots and rebellions were hatched in the gates of the cities which were the common meeting-places) shall not prevail against it. Some years ago a minister travelling in Wales was overtaken when on a high mountain by a storm. He saw a light and directing his steps toward it came to a shepherd's cabin, where he spent the night. The howling of the wind filled him with fear that the house would be swept away. He rose and sat by the fire all night prepared for the worst. In the morning the minister told his host how frightened he had been and expressed his surprise that the shepherd had slept so soundly while such a storm raged. "Oh!" said the shepherd, "I was not afraid of the house being carried away, and you need not have been. Its foundations are laid in the solid rock."

Whatsoever thou shalt bind, etc. Every Jewish child was instructed in the law. His father was required to see to that duty. An elementary study was sufficient for the greater number. Those who were to become Scribes or teachers of the people had to take an advanced course of study at the end of the elementary course. After this they were examined by the most learned Scribes and the examination was very thorough and searching. If they passed, they were authorized to teach the law. A key was handed to them as a symbol of their office, which was to open the mysteries of the law and make it plain to the people. The officiating examiner used the formula: "Have thou authority to bind and to loose." That is, to give decisions in difficult cases, to state whether such and such an act was allowable under the law, to permit or prohibit. The Jews had a theory that their Supreme Court, the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, had its counterpart in heaven, which confirmed whatever was done by the Jerusalem Sanhedrim. Thus Christ's words to Peter would be recognized by those who heard them as a kind of diploma.

Thou art an offence unto me. Peter was doing the work of Satan. Already in the wilderness Satan had urged Christ to take an easier way to his object of saving the world. Christ's human nature shrank from the suffering and must have taken sides with Satan. Now Peter was urging the same thing. Christ had resisted Satan, had resisted his own nature, and now he resisted Peter. He knew that the way to the crown was by the cross. In a charming story much read half a century ago, the author describes a wise father who resisted the pleading of his wife, his son and his friends. The boy at ten years old was almost a prodigy. He was learning Latin, his mother was teaching him French and music, one friend of his father was teaching him botany and another geology. But his father stopped it all by declaring that the boy should go to school. The boy did not want to go; his mother insisted that he was learning more at home than he could learn at school, and the family's friends protested, but the father was determined. The boy went and at the end of six months came home, the despair of all but his father. He had forgotten his botany, his geology and his other studies and cared only for play. He could run and leap and play cricket and pull an oar. His mother bemoaned his condition, but his father was pleased. "Now," he said, "he will become a man. If I had not sent him to school he would have grown up a sickly pedant, a nuisance to himself and other people." It should be a comfort to every Christian when his plans are crossed and he is apparently kept from what he thinks is best for him, that he has a wise Father in heaven who knows what is really best for him. If Peter could have had his way, Christ would never have suffered and died, but he would have failed in the purpose for which he came into the world.

All Eager to Help the West.

Mr. J. J. H. Gregory, Seed Grower, Marblehead, Mass., has the interests of the suffering farmers at heart when he writes:

I have supplied seed several times free to those who would be benefited by it and am ready to aid again if it is wise to do so.

All contributions of seed received at the Central Relief Station, 740-742 Broadway, will be sent to the headquarters of the Relief Committees at Palisades, Neb., and Kearney, Kan., by whom they will be distributed to best advantage among the farmers.

Mrs. Jennie Persell, Bloomington, Neb., a Volunteer Distributor, tells this bit of her experience:

We were thankful to receive the money and have used it where it has done the most good. I have a destitute neighbor with a big family of hungry children, the neediest of any I know, and I supplied them with four dollars' worth of food. The present needs of the people are clothes for the ragged children and underwear for the women.

H. H. Gane, Wilson, Kan., writes:

Your much appreciated $5 for the relief of the drought sufferers in this vicinity has been used carefully for the relief of the sick in three quite destitute families (save a balance of 50c. which will be carefully used later on). This help has brought comfort and good cheer to three families and four sick ones in those families.

Harry Sheffield, a volunteer distributor in Alpena, S. Dak., acknowledges through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the receipt of two dollars for relief work from a "Friend in Tennessee." Mr. Sheffield with the five dollar remittance we forwarded last week, helped several poor familes in his section of Jerrauld county.

"There are many who will not be able to live through the winter without help," writes Mr. Sheridan Williams of Woodruff, Kan.

Mrs. L. C. Bovce, of Beeville, Tex., a distributor, gives this interesting account of her relief work:

I divided the $5 as follows among three families most in need. To a widow with five children I gave $1.75 worth of groceries. To an old man and wife $2 in clothing. To a very poor family $1.25 worth of calico and domestic. I have received some help from others in this State which enabled us to gladden the hearts of those in need.

Hundreds Cold and Starving.

Rev. N. S. Lowrie, President of the Relief Committee, O'Neill, Nebr., writes as follows:

Received the $5.00 for the drought sufferers of Holt County, and we are very grateful. We have one hundred and fifty families in the county who need help. Fuel is a great want, for this county is treeless. People used corn-cobs, but we have no cobs and even he corn-fodder, which is often used for fuel is all fed to beasts now. People need bedcomforts and shoes. Second-hand clothing is a great need. We have had ten or twelve barrels and have helped 35 or40 families. We are having an awful cold snap now—10 below zero—and, oh! how can the people live through it! "He gives twice who gives quickly."

Rev. J. Rogers and other members of the Christian Endeavor Committee, Ransom, Kans., write:

Allow us to thank the good brethren and sisters of Mendon, Ill., for their kind and liberal contributions to the needy of this vicinity. Yesterday morning we received a large box of clothing, boots and shoes and distributed to ten of the most needy families. We have many more applications which we are unable to fill. We have failed in crops two years in succession.

Mrs. O. J. Siegrist, Logan, Kans., one of our distributors, writes:

I received your $5.00, and was more than thankful. I promptly bought flour for several families; and they asked many questions as to who sent it, and what prompted you to send it. The majority have begun to believe earnestly that there is something in Christianity after all. Many have made application to me for things, but I had to turn them away empty for the present.

Concerning her distributing work, Miss Pearl McCracken, Hoxie, Kan., writes:

Your letter and check were gladly received. We expended the money for fuel, meat, and clothing, and distributed them the best we could. Shoes are very much needed here and clothing and supplies will be thankfully received.

Mr. C. D. Littlefield, Secretary of the Litchfield, Neb., Aid Society, writes:

Your check received. Our people are in a desperate condition, and a great amount of aid is necessary. The condition of the farmers of Western Nebraska are beyond description. Not a day passes but what is recorded cases of complete destitution. Numbers have been found dead from starvation. This year is as much worse than was '90, as '90 was, than prosperity. Yet the "Bee," through its correspondents, makes the claim that but one county (Boyd), in the whole northwest, is in need of outside help. All the counties of Western Nebraska are in the same condition, with put one or two exceptions. Some, who have land for sale, hindered the work of relief in no small degree, and that influence has been felt even in our county, Sherman. Several reports have been published as to the needs of different counties, but Sherman has been falsely rated. If any one of the HERRAD readers can send us boxes or barrels of clothing or provisions, we will make good use of same. Money can be used to good advantage.

Trust Amid Affliction.

"Your gift of $5 purchased flour for seven poor families," writes Hannah Seick of Huntley, Neb., "all of whom needed it very much. The people are in need of food, and will need seed of all kinds, as we raised nothing last season. They will require food until harvest, as it is impossible for our merchants to carry them. If you have donations of other things they can be put to good use here, for the people need everything in fact. We cant see why our heavenly Father withheld rain last season, but he doeth all things well."

C. H. Brouilette, of Oxford, Neb., (a volunteer distributor) sends this reminder:

Kindly mention in your paper that the good people of the East who are sending donations to the Western sufferers ought to prepay the expressage or freight, as the parties to whom they are sent cannot. There is now an express package of the kind for me on which there is a charge of $7.50. which I cannot pay. Many thanks to the many responses which have already been made. I hope and pray they may continue to come.

Fred'k Flint, Stockville, Neb., writes:

No crops this season at all and a very light crop last. Some places they raised nothing either season. It was not known how badly our county was in need until the county commissioners furnished work on the public highway to those who had to have help or go hungry. They limited the help to the bare necessities of life. The rush was so great that our county funds were soon exhausted and they had to stop work. Now with Winter here and all local assistance exhausted we have to look for help through charity. People need food, clothing and fuel for this Winter and seed grain for next Spring. This is the condition of four-fifths of our people. We do not like to ask help but we have to.

Mrs. G. W. Shelton, Corydon, Ia., gives this cheering report of work for the sufferers:

We send to-day $6.42 to Mrs. Peter Burmood, Wood River., Neb., the proceeds of a collection taken for the destitute at the close of a Christmas entertainment given last evening in the Baptist Church in Corydon. Three boxes, 640 pounds of clothing contributed by citizens of Corydon, under my superintendence, are now at the depot awaiting free transportation to Mrs. Peter Burmood, Wood River, Neb. May you succeed in rousing the people everywhere in their behalf.

OUR CHARITY BALANCE SHEET.

THE accompanying report accounts for every dollar received for charitable purposes by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the year 1894, amounting altogether to the enormous sum of nearly $45,000.00.

We advised our readers not to send us money for the relief of Western Fire Sufferers, both Minnesota and Wisconsin having announced their abundant ability to meet the exigency. Notwithstanding this, the generous impulses of our readers constrained them to remit contributions to the extent of $635.36, and although we immediately dispatched Rev. George W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary, to the burned district, we found occasion to expend only $182.20, leaving a balance in our hands of $453.16 which we now transfer to the Western Relief Fund (see page 37), a course which, we trust, will meet the approval of the generous contributors.

For "Any Good Cause," $397.91 were contributed during the year, and $285.78 were expended, as per detailed statement on this page. The balance of $123.13 is likewise transferred to the Western Relief Fund (see page 37).

The demand for funds by the Bethesda Home, which by the way is doing a grand and good work, has been greater than the supply; but rather than let the work suffer, we have advanced $236.15, and we are confident that our readers will in a practical manner endorse our action.

The Moody Gospel Fund has also been helped a little in advance, and $126.16 is the amount of the overpayment which has been made in order to admit of remittances of $5000. Such of our readers as are interested in the glorious work done by this noblest of institutions, may manifest their approval of this overpayment if so disposed.

The Foreign Mission account has also been overpaid $62.00, which makes the total overpayment on account of charitable and missionary enterprises $425.31.

We carry over a balance of $77.45 to continue Rev. George W. Sharp in the field as Sunday School Missionary. The reports of his work, published from time to time in our columns, give encouraging evidence of how much good one consecrated man can do in the Master's service.

God has richly blessed our efforts in behalf of these various enterprises, and while we are profoundly grateful to Him, we extend our heartfelt thanks to our readers for the liberal encouragement which they have so cheerfully given us.

May He who loveth a cheerful giver, abundantly bless them in body and soul, in basket and in store, and richly reward them for every sacrifice, great or small, made in His Name.

CHRIST-LIKE GIVING.

HEARTY congratulations to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The noble work they are doing for their destitute brothers and sisters in Kansas and Nebraska proves that they are the grandest kind of people. Charity of this sort is a kind of spiritual pulse. It indicates spiritual health and shows that the heart is beating true to the principles inculcated by our Lord and Saviour. The physician puts his finger on the pulse of the patient and judges of his condition by the rate and character of the beats. The Bible intimates that there is just as good a test of a man's spiritual condition. "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" As the converse of this is true, these gifts to the starving farmers show not only love for them, but love for God. And how royally the gifts are flowing in! Money in checks and bills; warm clothing in parcels and barrels! How glad those poor, shivering, hungry people will be! How thankful that man will feel when his thin, haggard child is sitting down, warmly clad, to a good wholesome meal! How he will bless God that people, whom he never saw, took pity on his misery, and because they were like Him who "had compassion on the multitude because they had nothing to eat," gave them food! Oh, charity like this is God-like! And in these days it means more than at other times. Just now, very few people can give out of their abundance. Some of the letters that come with these gifts indicate that the gift involves self-denial. That enhances the value of the gift. He who praised the widow "who cast into the treasury all her living," never overlooks such gifts. Let the good work go on! "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble."

SABBATH THOUGHTS.

THE French proposed to have Sunday only once in ten days. I feel thoroughly satisfied with the present arrangement. If I proposed any change at all, it would be to have it every fifth day, coming in about where Friday now is, the Sabbaths coming nearer together and allowing more frequent opportunity for refreshment and recuperation. What are your regrets your joys and your anticipations? I suppose we might divide all the experiences into three groups; those that belong to the young, those that belong to the middle-aged and those that belong to the aged.

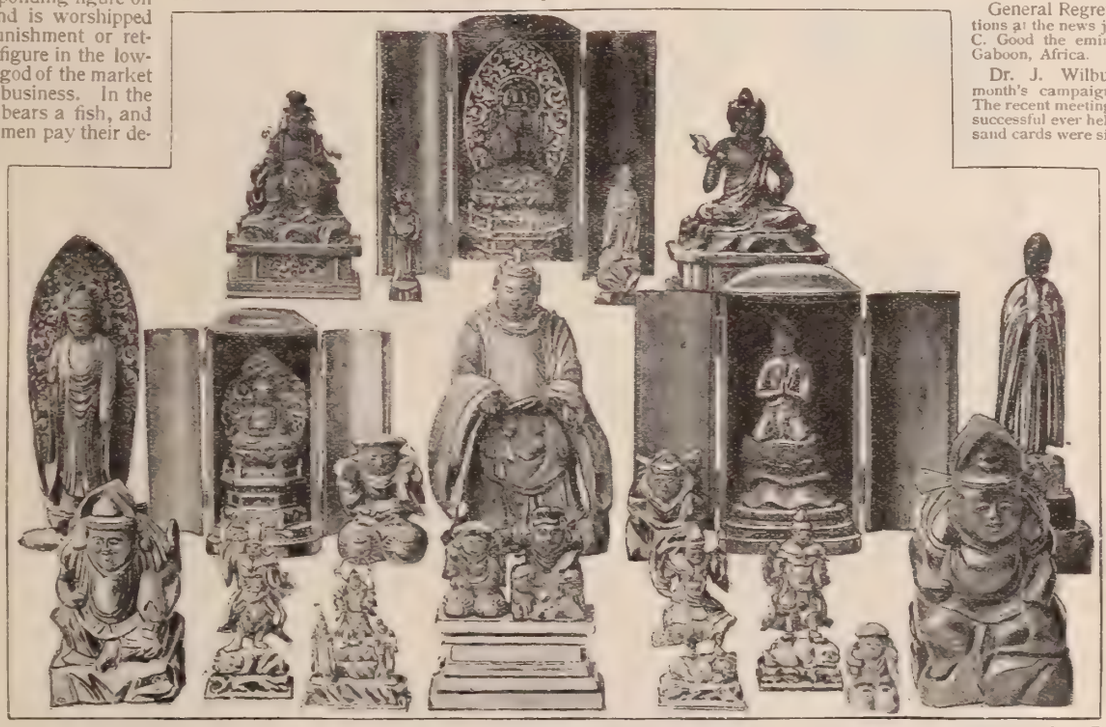
There are no doubt many young people who may be purer or not so pure as last Sabbath morning. How are you getting on, young man? Have you kept the promise you made since you left your father's house? Are all the characteristics of an upright Christian man becoming more evident in your life, or are they getting worn off? Can you consent to do things you could not do in other days? Are dishonesties less repulsive? Are unclean thoughts less vulturous in your appreciation? It is mean of you to put off the Christian religion to old age, thinking in the finality of life to do that for God which you ought to do in the very preface of your earthly existence.

In my boyhood days we had at school a boy characterized for his meanness and stinginess. He often came from his father's orchards bringing large and luscious fruit, but I never knew him to give anything to any of his comrades save once, and when we opened our hands to receive the bright and delicate gratuity, we were surprised at his sudden outburst of generosity, but found out when we had tasted it, that the fruit was rotten to the core. That was mean, but not half so mean as for you to give the best fruits of your life to the world and then when your energies are decayed to present them to God as a gratuity. God does not want your rotten apples. Give to God that which is sweetest, brightest, fairest.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE IDOLS OF JAPAN.

AN object lesson in missionary enterprise is furnished by the collection of discarded idols in the possession of the Rev. Satori Kato, the Japanese Presbyterian minister whose portrait appeared recently in this journal. A picture of a group of these idols reproduced from a photograph taken expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appears on this page. In this group Buddha appears in various attitudes, In some instances a species of screen is at his back to represent him appearing in the clouds. In some figures the hands are joined to represent him interceding for his people. Others show him in meditation, or in the attitude of benediction. But Buddha was not a monopoly of worship. In the upper part of the picture, on the left of the Buddha in the shrine, is a seated figure holding a key. That is the God of wealth, the key being supposed to give access to the treasury. The corresponding figure on the right bears an axe and is worshipped with awe as the god of punishment or retribution. The grotesque figure in the lowest left hand corner is the god of the market worshipped by people in business. In the opposite corner the figure bears a fish, and before it sailors and fishermen pay their devotions. The central figure and the smaller ones in the front are very important deities in Japan at the present time for they represent the god of war in various forms. Here, too, we have images of various household or family gods. One is supposed to have special charge of mothers; another has the duty of protecting infants; a third attends to the interests of youths, and so on. In the temples a full assortment of these various deities is found, and the worshippers select for their particular attention, the one that is supposed to have in its keeping the special boon needed by the devotees respectively at that particular time. Besides these, in every idolatrous household there are several images for family devotion. One of those in the group was a household god and when it was given to Mr. Kato by a woman who had turned from idols to serve the living God, she told him that it had been in the possession of her family for more than two hundred years, and seven generations of her ancestors had worshipped it. If any find it difficult to reconcile the worship of these images with the accounts we read of the advanced civilization of Japan we must remember that when Athens was the centre of learning and of the arts, Paul found in it almost as many idols as men and had to preach to the cultured Athenians against idolatry. Mr. Kato says that a constant danger attends the duty of exposing the folly of idolatry in Japan. His countrymen in abandoning their idols, often become prejudiced against all religion and declare themselves infidels. The work of the missionary must be constructive as well as destructive, otherwise, like the man in the parable, the idolater's heart may become an empty temple into which evil enters with increased power, and "the last state of that man becomes worse than the first." (Matt. 12: 43-45.)



IDOLS SURRENDERED BY THE CONVERTED IDOLATERS OF JAPAN.

From a photograph of a group in the possession of Rev. Satori Kato.

A Test of Ownership.

A long suit for the possession of a parrot which has involved law expenses to the amount of several hundred dollars, has just been decided in one of the law courts of San Francisco. It appears that a family had a parrot of which they were very proud. It was stolen and a search was made for it. One day the owner saw a bird hanging in a window and was convinced that it was his lost parrot. After a great deal of wrangling and a trial in a police court, a civil suit was brought to recover possession of the bird. When the case came up for trial there were over fifty witnesses examined. Each claimant produced witnesses to prove that he was the owner and the conflict of testimony was so confusing that the judge could not decide on the evidence. He therefore took his own way out of the difficulty. He asked each claimant to write down a list of his parrot's accomplishments and then took the bird and the lists to his own house, where he kept them a week. At the end of that time the case was called up again and judgment was given. The parrot, the judge said, was not the one that was stolen. Its talk and songs were those described by the people in whose house it had been found. The parrot had not uttered a word of those on the list furnished by the owners of the stolen bird. He therefore restored it to the family whose list corresponded with the parrot's performances. There can be no doubt of the justice of the decision for which the parrot unconsciously furnished the material. A similar judgment is constantly going on in society as to the character of men. The world does not always base its opinion on a man's profession of religion, nor on what church claims him as a member. If his conversation is habitually worldly, it concludes that he does not belong to Christ. (Matt. 12: 37.)

Held by a Wreck.

Two men were rescued from a perilous position a few days ago near Greenpoint, L. I. They were on board a sloop when a sudden squall struck her. The men were thrown down when the vessel careened before the squall. But one of them fell near the boat that was on deck and held fast to it. The sloop was evidently going down so the man crawled into the boat and soon afterward his companion joined him. The boat floated off when the sloop sank and the men felt sure they would be able to make the land in it. To their dismay, however, they found that the boat was securely tied to the sloop. They had forgotten to throw off the painter. It was impossible in their position to detach the rope from the boat and neither of them happened to have a knife on his person. The men made frantic efforts to keep afloat by bailing, but they knew that it would be impossible to keep up that kind of work very long. They were just giving themselves up for lost, when they were seen from another vessel. A boat was sent to their assistance and they were taken from their half submerged craft. Their failure to throw off the rope which attached the boat to the wreck nearly proved fatal, Disastrous consequences have often come from the connections between Christians and men who have made moral shipwreck. It should never be forgotten, especially by young people, that such associations may drag them down and that while seeking to benefit worldly acquaintances, they should avoid entangling alliances with them. (II. Peter 3: 17.)

A Pilot's Complaint.

Three wrecks have taken place recently in Long Island Sound, and the last one is to be made the subject of inquiry. The pilot, who was in charge of the vessel when it went ashore, has made an affidavit that the wreck was due to the discontinuance of a lighthouse on Sands Point. He says that shortly after midnight he was trying to make the head of the Sound and slowed the engines until he could see some landmark by which to steer. Only one light was visible and that one he mistook for Norwalk Light. He could not see the light that has shown from Sands Point for more than fifty years and has since learned that the Government has discontinued it. He was not long in discovering that his course was wrong. In a very short time he saw the breakers on the beach and before he could do anything to prevent it, his vessel went ashore near the lighthouse from which the warning light had been wont to shed its light. As that light could be seen for a distance of twelve miles he is sure that if it had been shining he would have seen it in time to save his vessel from wreck. It is alleged that the Government was induced to discontinue the light by a report that it was a useless expense. A similar opinion is often expressed as to the cost of church work but not by those who have a true estimate of the value of souls. Every Christian should take care that his own individual light is shining brightly. It would be a terrible thing for any soul to say, as the pilot did, that if some particular light had been shining the wreck would not have occurred. (Matt. 5: 14.)

Light From a Trolley Wire,

A contractor in Williamsburg, N. Y., has devised an ingenious plan for facilitating the work of repairing a surface railroad. The company operating the road were anxious to have the repairs done in the night when very few cars were run, so as to avoid the loss which would be entailed by the stoppage of traffic. The usual plan of using a gasoline tank for light was tried, but the wind was too strong to permit of a steady light being obtained by that means, and a steady light was essential to the work required. After several experiments, the contractor thought of the trolley wire overhead, which conveys the electricity for the running of the cars. The trolley wire was tapped and a wire attached, on which several incandescent lamps were fixed. The result was a strong, steady light by which the men could see to do their work. Thus the same power that gave motion to the cars also gave light for the repair of the road on which the cars ran. An analogous principle is familiar to every earnest Christian. When he is puzzled by some difficulty in the Bible, or in his own experience or by some mysterious providence, he finds when light comes upon it that it emanates from the same divine Source whence he derives his power to work. Christ's promise is fulfilled: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." (John 7: 17.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Our Subscribers and their Friends in other States, who may contemplate visiting New York, can secure Reserved Seats for Rev. Dr. Talmage's Sunday afternoon services in the Academy of Music, New York, by writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Tickets will be sent to all such applicants in advance, and without cost.

General Regret will be Felt in all Denominations at the news just received of the death of Dr. A. C. Good the eminent Presbyterian Missionary of Gaboon, Africa.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman commenced a month's campaign at Troy, N. Y., on January 15. The recent meetings at Indianapolis were the most successful ever held in that city. Over three thousand cards were signed by the seekers.

At the Recent Meeting of the American Bible Society, a letter was read from Rev. H. Loomis, of Japan, announcing the distribution of Japanese New Testaments among the soldiers, and Chinese New Testaments among the wounded Chinese prisoners.

The Experiment of Issuing reserved tickets for the evening services has been tried with satisfactory results at the People's Temple, Boston, Mass. It has been found that the certainty of having a regularly numbered seat corresponding with the ticket has been an inducement to many persons to attend.

Mr. F. H. Jacobs, of Chicago, Mr. Moody's helper in evangelistic work, has recently held a musical institute among the Minneapolis churches. He has done much toward bringing out the best musical and spiritual work of the Gospel Hymns. He has also been able to organize large choruses in most of the churches, which will be helpful in the evening services.

Evangelist W. H. Brown, of Chicago, is laboring in Canada. The Evening Banner, of Chatham, Ont., reports a wonderful work at Blenheim, which commenced on Dec. 30. Meetings are held every afternoon and evening, and a very deep religious interest has been aroused and is spreading through the neighborhood.

The Christian Churches of Toronto desiring to make some substantial acknowledgment of the benefits resulting from Mr. D. L. Moody's recent campaign in that city, have sent a donation of one thousand dollars to the Moody Schools, Northfield.

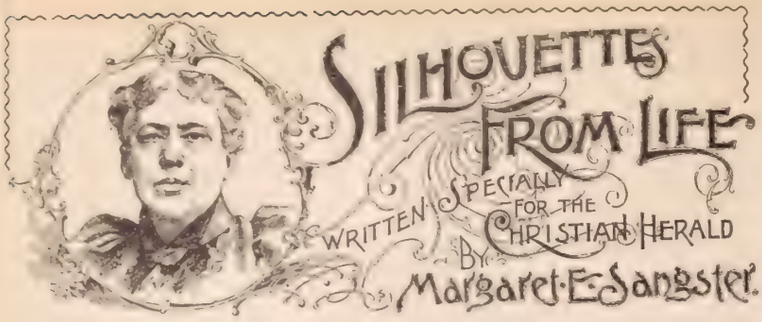
The Forty-eighth Report of the American Missionary Association just issued is a noble record of work among the Indians in the West and the Chinese on the Pacific Coast. In its schools and training institutions there are over twelve thousand pupils and nearly five hundred teachers and profes-

Rev. J. N. Thomas of Tipton, Ind., writes that a remarkable work of grace has been going on in his church under the labors of Evangelist W. A. Bodell of Crawfordsville, Ind. Seventy new members, the greater part men have been added to the church and there are many more whose impressions have the promise of conversion.

The Famous Broadway Tabernacle, New York, is to be sold, and a new edifice built for the church farther uptown. It was built in 1859, and has been since that time the Cathedral of New York Congregationalism. The first building occupied by the church was in Chatham Square. Its pastor then was the eminent revival preacher Charles G. Finney.

Returns of Religious Statistics Compiled by The Independent, show that in the four years since the census of 1890 there has been a general gain in all denominations in the number of churches, ministers and communicants. The gain in the number of churches is: Methodists of all branches, 7,319; Baptists, 1,678; Disciples, 1,522; Presbyterians, 874; Protestant Episcopal, 795; Lutherans, 576; Congregationalists, 532.

Special Meetings for "the Deepening of Religious Life of Christians and the awakening of the Unconverted" are being held every afternoon and evening except Saturdays in the Lafayette Ave. Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. They began on Monday last and will continue for two weeks. Among the speakers who have arranged to conduct the meetings are Dr. A. T. Gordon and Dr. Erdman.



TWO SNOW STORMS.

A GRAY sky, sullen and brooding. White flakes falling silently, drifting before the wind, covering landmarks.

Intense, bitter, biting cold, the snow which penetrates the thickest clothing, and chills you to the bone. Lake Michigan foam-tossed and furious, the wild waves booming on the shore! Here and there, widely separated, log cabins standing in the middle of cultivated fields, sometimes a mere patch of ground only, with sheds for cattle, where to-day a mighty city's throbbing heart beats time to the pulses of trade the world over.

In one such house the family were assembled 'round the lamp; supper was over, a big fire blazed on the hearth and the shutters were bolted and barred. Fifty years ago, the dread of Indian prowlers was on every settler's family, the thought of the red men creeping stealthily up with tomahawk and fire-brand was an oppressive terror, never absent. So people were on guard. Only at Ellsler's there was always a rosy light just over the door, for the mother had compassion on the decent wayfarer stumbling through the darkness. This stormy night the light glowed brightly in its niche and flickered out over the snow.

A pretty sight they were—the young, strong father, the mother golden-haired and blue-eyed, the sturdy boys and the eight year old girl. A darling baby daughter asleep in her cradle completed the group. Eight o'clock struck, and the father took down the large-print leather-bound Bible, and began to read. The twenty-third Psalm was chosen. In strong, sonorous tones, he read the familiar verses:

"The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters."

The Psalm being ended, they sang, all together:

How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, [illegible]
word,
[illegible]
Who unto the Saviour for refuge have [illegible]

MR. ELLSLER RESCUED BY THE FAMILY HE HAD BEFRIENDED.

Then the father prayed. The little daughter, who used to hear her father pray, remembers yet how fervent, how confiding, how glad and tender, those prayers were. If ever prayers soared to heaven's gate, stormed it with loving earnestness and trust, they were those of Reuben Ellsler. Then, at the last, he always led the children, and they joined in "Our Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name!"

As the family arose from their knees this stormy night, they were aware of a low knocking, low at first, but growing louder every minute, and voices crying, "Let us [illegible] We have wandered from the way! Let us in before we perish! If you have human hearts, dinna wait, but [illegible]"

Reuben looked at Phebe, Phebe with the children clinging 'round her skirts, returned the look, then:

"Open the door, dear," was what she said. "We cannot deny shelter to any this night, were he the worst enemy we had on earth."

Reuben unbarred the door and admitting a wild gust of wind, and a great blast of snow. In the white wake of this, tottered in a man who had battled with the cold and the gathering darkness for hours; his wife bundled up in shawls and furs, hooded and veiled, had her baby in her arms.

They were Highlanders from Inverness, and on their journey to what was then considered the far West of America, where friends had preceded them, and a new home awaited their endeavors. Caught in the snow-storm, they had lost the conveyance in which the last stage was to be made.

"'Deed an' we scarce know how it happened," explained the wife. "We had but to cross the road, and we took the wrong turn, an' we hae maundered aboot till we're nigh to fainting. But we heerd your gude mon pray and the sound guided us and we were no feared to knock where Christians prayed to Almighty God."

Three days and nights elapsed before the tempest was over, and the snow blockade raised. Paths were cut, the sun came out, the world laughed in its wintry splendor. Warmed and fed, the MacMurdo family was speeded on its way, Mr. Ellsler carrying them many miles in his own sleigh, covered with buffalo robes and with hot bricks at their feet; and in their basket a bountiful luncheon packed by Mrs. Ellsler.

Twenty-five years passed. Reuben Ellsler's farm had been broken up into city lots. He had prospered steadily, and was a man of substance, held in high esteem in the community, where he was a leader. He had held the foremost offices in town and State, and was his pastor's right-hand man and the most acute and sagacious of church-workers. His business instinct had early led him to invest largely in land and at fifty, he was a millionaire.

At fifty, he was stouter and graver of course, but upon the whole, not much older looking than when twenty years younger. He still worked hard. Most Americans do. It does not occur to them to shirk work simply because they have made money.

One cloudy morning in December, his fiftieth December, Mr. Ellsler said good-bye to his still comely Phebe, and galloped away on brown Betty, the mare. It threatened a storm, but he had to keep an engagement at a distant point. The "onding" of snow to quote Sir Walter Scott, led him to take the railroad at a station eight miles from home, stabling Betty until his return. He telegraphed home when he might be expected and went fearlessly on.

How helpless we are in a struggle with the elements! Mr. Ellsler, not one mile from a great city, found himself that evening, baffled, beaten, freezing, almost in desperation. He ran, he shouted, he struck his hands together, he called for help, but it seemed as if he must perish in that blinding, seething storm. The snow cut his face like a whip, his teeth chattered, he began to grow numb and indifferent to fate, longing only to sleep. When suddenly, he never knew how, a great red star rose and glowed before him, a path of light over the snow led straight into the fiery radiance, kind hands were busy rubbing him, pulling off his clothing, offering him food and drink. And a hearty voice beside him cried, in strong Scotch accents, "We were at the buks, and feyther was reading 'The Lord's my Shepherd,' when, sudden, it went to my heart like a knife I heard the voice of the man who took us in to the fire and gave us bed and home, twenty-five years ago. It was a voice I'd know in the New Jerusalem, and it was a voice of trouble. 'Preserve us and keep us, mon!' said I to feyther, 'but yon's Mr. Ellsler in the tempest, and we maun cease pravin' and go to his help. And right glad we are that here's the home, and the love, we've owed you all this time.'"

Lying under soft blankets, with warmth and comfort and deliverance from death filling him with great thankfulness, Reuben Ellsler heard a song of praise in the room below. His hosts were singing,

How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent word.

HOLY DESIRE.

Oh, that mine eyes might closed be,
To what concerns me not to see;
That deafness might possess mine ear,
To what concerns me not to hear;
That truth my tongue might always tie,
From ever speaking foolishly;
That no vain thought might ever rest,
Or be conceived within my breast;
That, by each word and deed and thought,
Glory may to my God be brought.

The Ragged Urchins' Friend.

John MacGregor, Voyager, Explorer, Philanthropist and Christian Worker.

NEW men striving against adverse conditions, have accomplished more in a quiet unostentatious way in the furtherance of God's work among the neglected waifs and strays than the late John MacGregor. In a sketch of his life, published in "The Presbyterian Observer," the writer says: MacGregor seems to have been cradled in adventure, for even in the days of infancy he was surrounded by peril. In 1825, his father, an officer in the English army, sailed for India with his wife and newly-born child, on board the "Kent." The ship took fire in the Bay of Biscay; but, after looking death right in the face, the MacGregors were saved in a manner little short of miraculous. Thirty years later, the child, now grown to be a man, was busy on a Scotch race-course on connection with the work of the open-air mission, when he met an old sailor selling some doggerel verses about the burning of the "Kent," at which he professed to have been present. Mr. MacGregor went up to the man and declared that he, too, had been on board the ship at the time of the awful catastrophe. The sailor then quickly scanned him before exclaiming: "That you were not, unless you were the baby I helped into the boat!" It turned out to be the baby, who had developed into the stalwart man, who, for the time being, was an evangelist bent on doing good to frivolous pleasure seekers.

Industry and methodical habits enabled him to do the work of a dozen men. As a philanthropist, he did work for the Ragged Schools, and Shoe-black Brigades of London, which redeemed many young lives from the temptations of street life to honest and useful activity. As an educator, he opened a path to knowledge for many who otherwise would have been debarred from acquaintance with the master-minds of the ages. As an earnest Christian worker, he did splendid service in connection with the Bible Society, the Open-air Mission, the Pure Literature Society, and similar organizations, the purpose of which was to bring the principles of Christianity to bear on the hearts and lives of men.

The service by which Mr. MacGregor will be best remembered is his philanthropic efforts in behalf of the ragged urchins of London. Late in the year 1850 he and three friends met to consider how the coming Exhibition could be utilized so as to provide employment for the boys who were homeless as well as taskless. It was resolved to start a shoe-black brigade. MacGregor threw himself into the movement with characteristic energy, and carried it out with pluck and perseverance. He and his boys were laughed at for some time, but the value of their endeavor came to be recognized as the months rolled by.

The system upon which the organization was worked was a very admirable one. A "Home" was provided for the boys, to which they marched when the day's work was done. After a good wash and brush-up, each handed in his earnings, which were divided into three parts, one part going into the boy's own pocket, one part to Society's funds for working expenses, and one part to the boy's bank. When the inner man was refreshed, a couple of hours were spent in lessons in reading, writing and arithmetic. The evening closed with some games, prayers and bed. The good done by this organization cannot be calculated in figures. It has checked crime, redeemed young lives, and opened the door into useful service for hundreds, who otherwise would have been hounded into criminal careers. John MacGregor did several things which won greater applause from the world, but he never did anything more enduring in value or more hopeful to humanity, than the formation of the Shoe-black Brigade.

A Wheelbarrow Tour in China.

A Lady Missionary Describes Her Peculiar Traveling Experiences.

MRS. HOWARD TAYLOR (formerly Miss Geraldine Guinness) writes a very interesting account of a recent missionary tour in China. She says:

How kind and pleasant the women seem! Here is one old lady who has hobbled out to see us, rice-basin and chopsticks in hand, and her grey old hair half hanging down her back, in her anxiety not to miss the foreigners! There are numbers of pleasant, middle-aged, motherly women, and quite a crowd of younger women and girls—bright, healthy, happy-looking, and so kindly disposed towards us! At the top of the bank is one picturesque group of five young girls in bright red and blue garments, and one very old lady, with white hair and tiny feet, sitting on the ground beside them. When all was ready, we went ashore to follow the barrows to the town, a large and friendly crowd escorting us all the way. How we longed to stay amongst them, and tell them of Jesus! But our time was limited, and our destination far distant.

By the time we reached the homes of our men, the real business had begun. The large and cumbrous barrows, on which we were to travel two hundred and fifty miles, had to be loaded and prepared for the road. There they lay, awkward, heavy-looking objects. How could they ever be made available for the transit of human beings on such a journey? We eyed them ruefully.

Springless, primitive constructions, they simply consist of a strong wooden framework, with one large wheel in the middle, and handles both back and front. On one side of the wheel a seat can be devised, and the whole is covered by a sort of hood, made of bamboo matting, bent round and fastened at the sides, under which you sit, divided by the wheel and facing backwards. Luggage is piled on in front, and inside, the traveller's bedding is spread out, to save those poor unfortunates from being shaken and battered, jumbled and jolted, beyond the possibility of endurance.

Oh these long hours of waiting in the dust and heat, while the barrows were being packed! Feeling we could do nothing to help, Mrs. Taylor and I moved off a little to draw away the crowds. This was effectual, for the people followed and surrounded us, hemmed us in on every side, and stood gazing at us, and commenting most freely upon everything connected with our appearance and proceedings. By-and-by my husband brought us some Chinese tea and a piece of cake from our food-basket: but this was all we had till night.

Hour after hour we sat in the burning sun, talking as well as were able to the hundreds of friendly observers who crowded around us increasingly, till we were almost exhausted. At last a nicely-dressed, pleasant woman made her way up to us, and kindly invited us to step into her house nearby to rest. She seemed to mean it, so we went. While dear Mrs. Taylor followed her into an inner room to lie down, I sat in the courtyard talking to the still interested people until my voice gave out. Just then a message came for me to go indoors.

Inside, across a little courtyard, I found Mrs. Taylor quite at home with our new friend. Within five minutes I was fast asleep. Soon the barrows were ready, and the men willing to start. With grateful hearts we bade our hostess farewell, and passed out once more into the crowd and neat.

Two barrows laden with luggage had gone on, and two were waiting for us. Mr. and Mrs. Hudson Taylor were soon ensconced in the first, and the second was for Howard and me. Such a funny little nest it looked to creep into on my side of the wheel! Bedding and pillows piled up made a comfortable seat, and outside, across the handles of the barrow, a strong bamboo rod was fastened, on which to rest our feet.

As soon as we were in, the powerful young barrow-man slipped the broad leather strap across his shoulders, lifted and balanced the barrow—throwing us backward at a sharp incline—and called to the other man in front to start away. With a creak, a jolt, and a long, strong pull, the cumbrous machine moved slowly forward, the dust began to rise around us from the feet of the men and the wheel-track in the sandy road; with a gasp we clung, as if for dear life, to the framework of the barrow, jumbling heavily over ruts and stones; dry and oilless, the slowly-revolving wheel set up a discordant wail, somewhat resembling the most atrocious bagpipes; large beads of perspiration stood out upon the forehead of the man scarcely a yard away from us, bending himself so determinedly to his task; the friendly crowds disappeared in the distance—and our journey was begun.

MILLENNIAL SHADOWS.

Submission to Christ's Rule During the Millennium Merely Superficial.

BY GEORGE F. TRENCH, B. A.*

VERY remarkable indications are given in the Scripture as to the mixed character of the Millennium, in which time Satan will be imprisoned, but not finally rendered powerless: in which, rebellion will be driven beneath the surface, only to break out at the first opportunity with accumulated force; and in which multitudes will yield nothing more than a "feigned obedience" to the all-powerful Ruler, who, with his associates, the restored people of Israel, will rule the nations with a rod of iron from his throne of power on God's holy hill of Zion. (Psa. 2.)

We are not limited to Revelation 20, for our knowledge of the moral character of the Millennium. It is set forth fully in the Old Testament prophecies, notably in the Psalms.

That there will be then an atmosphere of tranquillity, wholly foreign to our present experience, is undoubted. But what is taught us is, that that peace will be mainly superficial and unreal. Three times in the Psalms (18: 44; 66: 3; 81: 15), we find the submissiveness of the nations of the world to Christ's rule described as "feigned obedience."

Psalm 110, rightly occupies a foremost place in all study of the Kingdom; its opening words being four times quoted in the New Testament, to show their proper application to our Lord Jesus Christ. (See Matt. 22: 44; Acts 2: 34; I. Cor. 15: 25; and Heb. 1: 13.) Now what says that inspired utterance, which our Lord has endorsed with his own imprimatur? Christ is to rule in the midst of enemies.

This, then, is the condition of the world's masses morally. They are strangers to God, enemies to Christ, haters of Jehovah; and that external calm which has so captivated the imagination of Christians is the product of power, not of grace; is the result of fear, not love; and is maintained by ever-repeated execution of judgment on offenders. I ask my readers if this is exactly the Millennium they have pictured to themselves? Does it convey the idea of a perfect state, of a Kingdom worthy of the Prince of Peace? If anyone replies, "These judgments cannot possibly occur during the progress of the reign, they must be merely initiatory," I ask for some Scripture proof. I challenge the suggestion with great confidence, and point to Isa. 64: 23 again, and to Zech. 14: 16-19, where we are plainly taught that the judgment of a dearth of rain will be inflicted on every nation that shall fail (throughout the thousand years), to send its representatives once a year to Jerusalem to worship. But, even if this theory could be sustained, is it not manifest that a Kingdom, the peace of which is procured and brought about by such means, can be nothing more than what it has already been shown to be, a reign of might, and leaving the world in its spirit, exactly where it is now.

In the glorious Age of Ages that lies beyond that last of this world's long series of failures, the will of God will be done on a new earth as it is done in heaven. On that day of glory there shall fall no night; there no tears shall be shed; no death, by fire from heaven or otherwise, shall invade its perfect peace, for death itself must be destroyed; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away.

On that new earth the heavenly city shall descend, the Bride adorned for her Husband, the ethereal mountain where Israel shall dwell: and the nations shall not go up as the sand of the sea to encompass it with armies, but shall peacefully walk in its light, and bring into it the glory and honor of all kings.

This cannot be the Millennial Age, for there shall be "no more curse," nor death. It cannot be Eternity, for the Lamb is still on the throne. The throne is the throne of God and the Lamb. It must therefore of necessity be a period intervening between these two.

ACCEPTING CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Jan. 27. Rev. 22: 1-17.

PEOPLE often complain that the language or the pulpit is technical and, to them, incomprehensible. They use the language of the street, the store, and the newspaper, and do not know what the preacher means when he begs them to "accept Christ," to "come to Christ," to give themselves to him. But are such phrases really only theological jargon? When they are used in ordinary conversation, in the same sense they are understood readily. Ask an Englishman what is meant by the phrase, "accepting the Queen's shilling." The shilling in question is the coin in ordinary use. It is given by an officer in the army to the ordinary citizen. In the course of a day he may pay out several such coins without any significance. He may buy food with it, he may with it pay a man to drive him in a hack, or he may buy a book with it In either case the transaction ends there, it is payment for an equivalent and there are no ulterior consequences But in the course of the day some one may accept a shilling from him, and the act will involve results that change his whole life. The officer is empowered to enlist recruits for the army, and the giving of the shilling is the sign or seal of the engagement. One day the young man may work for any man who will employ him, may rise in the morning at any time that suits him, may wear any kind of clothes he chooses, may spend the day as he likes, may go from place to place according to his fancy; but let him accept the Queen's shilling from a recruiting officer, and all this is changed. He has entered the service. He must live where he is ordered, he must go to a certain place, it may be thousands of miles away, he must wear certain clothes, attend to certain duties, and his liberty is curtailed in a hundred ways. Besides this, if there is a war in progress, he may be required to go into danger, to risk his life, and even to go to certain death if he is ordered. Thus the word, "accept," in common parlance has a meaning not far removed from the sense in which it is used in the pulpit. The man who "accepts Christ," accepts him as his King, and is henceforward his servant. The sermons delivered in our pulpits are nothing more than explanations of the rules of the service, enunciations of its principles and descriptions of its rewards. There should be nothing mysterious about accepting Christ in this sense. Other matters are involved, but this initiation is simple. After that is passed, the recruit begins to find delightful mysteries, as well as some that are distressing. He becomes dissatisfied with himself, finds that he cannot obey as he intends or wishes to do, that he is remiss, incompetent and perverse, but as he regrets and tries to do better, he is mysteriously helped, his nature is changed by some unseen power, the trend of his life is upward instead of downward. In accepting Christ, he has become a new man. His motives are changed; he loses his interest in amusements which he formerly enjoyed, and delights in occupations which were formerly insipid to him. Christ did not exaggerate when he likened it to a new birth.

THE Y. M. C. A. AT KINGSTON, ONT.

Among the buildings owned by the Young Men's Christian Associations of Canada, the new one at Kingston, Ont., is conspicuous for its size and beauty. The picture of it which appears on this page shows how much skill and taste have been exercised to make the edifice really suitable for the work as well as an ornament to the city. The building is arranged for use exclusively by the Association. On the ground floor on the right of the entrance hall is the parlor and behind that the auditorium. On the left is the library, reading room, and Secretary's office. Between these at the rear of the entrance hall is the physical department which is one of the finest in the country. A large swimming bath, with lavatories, dressing-rooms and lockers occupies the ground floor, and above that is the gymnasium, with an area of forty by sixty feet. The second floor of the main building contains a large hall, the directors' room and the rooms devoted to the boys' auxiliary. The third floor is devoted to class-rooms and apartments for the janitor. The building is of pressed brick heavily faced with rock stone. The Association which has gained possession of this handsome home is only ten years old, but it has had a career of great success. Several of its officers have gone to more extended fields of usefulness, and one of them has entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The members are remarkable for their enthusiastic devotion to the Association, and their energy in aggressive Christian work.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

The special offering for missions taken up by the Leagues on Thanksgiving Day did not fulfil expectations. It was, however, a magnificent contribution to the funds and probably may yet be increased by amounts yet to be sent in. Up to the close of the year the Treasurer had received $27,500. If fifty cents per member had been contributed, as was asked, the total would have been $400,000.——A League of Hindustani-speaking Methodists has been organized in Calcutta. Fifteen persons were enrolled at the first meeting and these elected officers and appointed committees. The next meeting was appointed for a date two weeks later. At that meeting there was a large attendance and thirty-two names were added to the roll. The officers believe that the numbers will continue to grow as there is much enthusiasm among those who have already joined.—— The Epworth House in Chicago is receiving generous support from the Leagues. It began in a small way with very little money in hand, but now occupies a large building with a large lecture hall and nineteen rooms, some of which are used as class-rooms and others as dormitories. It has a dispensary, a kindergarten, a sewing school, a restaurant, a Sunday School and a Senior and Junior Epworth League. In six months it furnished six hundred and fifty-nine free lodgings and the free meals it has supplied average over six hundred a month.——Secretary Schell announces the complete arrangements for the Epworth Extension Course. The total cost of five lectures will be thirty dollars, to which must be added in each case the lecturer's travelling expenses. All applications should be addressed to Rev. W. E. McLennan, Berwyn, Ill.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The First French Baptist Young People's Society was organized in the Baptist Church of Worcester, Mass., of which the Rev. Arthur H. James is pastor. This is a mission church consecrated to labor among the French Romanists of the city. The Young People's Society now has twenty-three members and is two months old. Mr. James says: Three weeks ago nine were added to the membership, all Romanists by previous training and all young people too.

Plainfield, N. J., has just erected a new building for its Young Men's Christian Association. It is on the corner of Front Street and Watchung Ave. The building cost forty thousand dollars. It has a well-equipped gymnasium and is tastefully furnished. The association was organized twenty-five yoars ago.

A member of the Young Men's Christian Association in Rome, Mr. Pirazzini, has left for Springfield, Mass., where, thanks to the support of Mr. J. Stokes, of New York, he will study at the school of the general secretaries, and will then become the secretary of the General Association, which, it is hoped, will be formed in Rome by the fusion of the different Circoli of the churches.

An echo meeting in Samoa has been heard from, which was held after the Endeavorers there had received the Cleveland papers giving the reports of the convention. The condition of Samoa at present makes union of the societies there very difficult, but Rev. J. E. The Kentucky State Convention of the Society of King's Daughters was held in the First Presbyterian Church of Owensboro, recently. Dr. Charles P. Luce, the pastor, presided at a crowded popular meeting of delegates and friends. Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson and Mrs. Isabella C. Davis were present during the sessions, speaking with great acceptance. This Society has only recently been introduced into the State, but has already nearly one hundred circles, with fifteen hundred names enrolled. These are extending special help to the Jennie Cassidy Infirmary in Louisville. Mrs. Charles P. Luce was chosen State Secretary and Mrs. J. C. Crawford, Treasurer. At the closing consecration meeting Mrs. Dickinson and Mrs. Davis gave the crosses of the order to fifty persons.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Rochester, Minn. What law did David break in numbering the people? Was there any prohibition of a census in the Mosaic law?

There is none recorded that we know of. On the contrary, provision for a census was made. (See Ex. 30: 12, 13). But in that provision there is an intimation of danger and this David apparently ignored. David's sin appears to have consisted in his motive. He probably wanted the census as gratifying to himself indicating that his reliance was upon his army not upon God.

O. H. Bube, Desterville, N. Y. What was done with Jephthah's Daughter? Was she offered for a burnt offering?

There can be no information outside of the record and that of course you have read. Several eminent Jewish writers, notably Levi ben-Gersom and Bechai, besides many Christian scholars, believe that the fulfilment of the vow went no further than to devote her entirely to the Lord's service. In thus being compelled to celibacy she underwent a fate dreaded by Jewish women. It is inconceivable that her father offered her in sacrifice as he must have known that such an act would be abhorrent to God. Besides, he might have redeemed her and probably did so under the law specially provided. (See Lev. 27: 3-5).

W. J. S., San Antonio, Tex. Is it possible for any one to know the year in which our Lord will return to the earth? Did he not say that no one will know the day nor the hour?

We think Christ did not say exactly that. He said no one "knoweth" and he expressly included himself for he added that at that time he did not know. It is possible that some may know as the time draws near. He described a condition of society which was to be a sign of his nearness. He said that when we saw certain things existing, we might know that his advent was near "even at the doors." (See Matt. 24: 33). The Apostle Paul added to this statement that certain persons were "not in darkness that that day should overtake them as a thief." (II. Thess, 5: 4.)

E. T., Rock Springs, Ky Is it right for a woman to speak and pray in public?

It would be assuming a great deal to pronounce authoritatively on the question. As a matter of opinion, however, and with the full knowledge that many eminent authorities hold otherwise, we see no valid objection to a woman preaching or praying publicly. We think that the familiar passage in which Paul directs women to keep silence in the churches was evoked by the condition of society at the time, and that in a different condition of society he would not have written it. His recommendation of celibacy and his advice to a pastor to drink wine instead of water, are, we believe, utterances of a similarly temporary character. If a woman had taken part in the services in Apostolic days she would at once have been set down as an immodest woman, and a scandal would have attached to the Christian community. There was therefore good reason for the prohibition then. People who insist on the literal obedience to Paul's injunction seem to forget that if we obeyed it literally no woman could sing in church.

C. R. M., Alma, Mich. A pastor I heard lately preached against wearing a gold watch, or a gold ring and said that we could not expect God's blessing if we wore any but the very poorest and commonest clothes. Is that true Christian doctrine?

We would not judge the pastor. Doubtless, he meant well and there is only too much reason for protest against ostentation and the waste of money in mere adornment. We do not believe, however, that the blessing of God would be withheld from a man or woman who wears decent clothes corresponding with the position they occupy in society. The sin to be most earnestly avoided is pride in such things. No one has a right to dictate in such trivial matters as the quality of another's clothes. The Christian is a law unto himself. As he consecrates himself unto God he will be more and more disposed to curtail his expenditure on himself, that he may have the money to devote to religious and philanthropic work. But how far he shall carry this self-denial his conscience must decide.

In a Queen's Kitchen.

Where the Royal Dinners are Prepared at Windsor Castle—Queens and Empresses as Notable Housewives.

THAT imperial station is not wholly incompatible with proper attention to household duties, is proved by many instances. Probably the best queens have been those who were not so wholly taken up with the pomp and glitter attached to the ceremonial functions of their royal position, that they had no time to interest themselves in the training of their children, the conduct of their households, and the ordering of those house-wifely tasks in which the true woman takes delight. Such belong to the class of noble women of whom it is said in the last chapter of Proverbs that "she seeketh wool and flax and worketh willingly with her hands: she riseth also while it is yet night and giveth meat to her household and a portion to her maidens. . . She looketh well to the ways of her household." Such women were the late Empress Augusta, of Germany, and ex-Empress Frederick. To the same illustrious category of royal housewives belong the present Empresses of Germany and Austria, the Dowager Queen of Holland, the Queens of Denmark and England, and, as correspondents have recently stated, the Empress of Japan. That the domestic virtues, combined with works of charity and benevolence, are not inseparable from the most elevated station, the lives and daily experiences of these royal ladies have abundantly testified. And there are many other women, occupying high stations in public and social life in this and other lands, who are equally distinguished by the possession of those rare qualities that mark the "perfect housewife."

In the illustration on this page, reproduced from the "Illustrated London News," a glimpse is afforded of a royal kitchen. It is the culinary establishment at Windsor Castle, and is probably the most extensive and best equipped kitchen in all England, although no doubt less expensively fitted than those of Berlin, Vienna and St. Petersburg. Here there is nothing for mere show but everything for use. The long lines of ranges and ovens, surmounted by rows of pots and saucepans, the substantial-looking carving-tables, and the active, bustling servants all go to make up the complement of a well-ordered, serviceable kitchen, where nothing is lacking, and nothing wasted and where there are no inefficients. Here are roasted the "royal barons of beef," for the great dinners that are given by Her Majesty. The main fire-place is a spacious one with a dozen or more spits, and at times there are eight or ten roasts in front of the great fire at once, all suspended over a huge drip-pan. On festive occasions, "barons of beef," boar's head and game-pie are the famed products of the kitchen, but it is sometimes turned to other uses than the feeding of royalty and nobility. During the recent floods in the neighborhood, which caused much distress, hundreds of gallons of soup were prepared in the royal kitchen by the Queen's order and given to the poor.

The Beauty of Plain Living.

We love to see people live well, says a thoughtful writer, and to dress respectably, and enjoy themselves, but there is a happy mean in all these these things, and when that is passed in the direction of extravagance, the people distress and enslave themselves, and diminish their ability to do good. For the sake of keeping up the styles people live far above their income, harass themselves with debt, wear themselves out and keep themselves in a constant nervous strain by giving themselves fashionable dinners, fashionably entertaining, and making fashionable calls. How much better is a plain, quiet, Christian home, where all is peace and cordiality, the neighbors heartily welcome to come and go at will, and freed from the pestering, senseless conventionalities of fashionable life! Why should our earthly life, which at best cannot continue a hundred years, be fretted, and burdened, and worn out prematurely by vain efforts to ape the manners of the idle, irreligious, self-seeking, rich devotees of pleasure? God has us in the world for a nobler purpose than this, and those do well who strive to place this service above all else.

Children's Confidences.

If the parent has been the companion and friend, the comrade and confidant of the child all the way along from infancy to maturity, there will exist between the two a mode of communication which, without words, will keep up a perfect mutual understanding, so that both will feel just what is proper in every delicate exigency. But, unfortunately, this ideal equilibrium of sympathy is very rare, and the cold, hard facts of life must be anticipated by the parent long precedent to the days of manhood and set before the child without shrinking or prejudice. And here, says the "Chautauquan," is where the most difficult part of duty lies. The nearer we can come to regarding our children with the absolute vision of love, the nearer we shall approach the ideal of understanding with regard to their natures, dispositions, tempers, needs.

A Village of Washerwomen.

Writing from Heidelberg, Germany, Harriet W. Patton gives this entertaining sketch of village life in that country: It would not appear strange to you, she writes, were I to say that the women did the washing here, for that is a feature common with most countries; but what is perhaps not so usual is to see a whole village, whose women are almost exclusively engaged in washing clothes, in fact a village which is the laundrying-place for two or three towns, one being some miles distant. This is what can be said of the village of Zeigelhausen, which is situated on the right bank of the Neckar, some three miles from here. Monday is the great day for gathering the clothes, and all day they are to be seen in transit through the city. Sometimes they are carried in baskets by women, but oftener they are collected in large wooden carts usually drawn by cows. Zeigelhausen has natural advantages which eminently fit it for laundrying purposes. The houses, for the most part, are built up against the mountains, and between the houses and the river there is, first, a stream of beautiful clear water, at which every day, women are to be seen washing the clothes; then, beyond this stream and stretching to the river, lies a green sward which affords an excellent drying and bleaching ground.

Take Time.

Let us take time for the good-by kiss. We shall go to the day's work with a sweeter spirit for it. Let us take time to speak kind words to those we love. By and by, when they can no longer hear us, our foolishness will seem more wise than our best wisdom. Let us take time to be pleasant. The small courtesies which we often omit because they are small, will some day look larger to us than the wealth, which we have coveted, or the fame for which we have struggled. Let us take time to get acquainted with our families. The weath you are accumulating, may be a doubtful blessing to the son who is a stranger to you. Your beautifully kept house, busy mother, can never be a home to the daughter, whom you have no time to caress.

HOME.

AN exile from Eden how sweet to my soul,
The word of thy promise, my Saviour, my Goal;
A stranger and pilgrim on earth as I roam,
The Lord is my Portion, my Refuge, my Home.
Home, home, sweet, sweet home.
O, keep me my Saviour, my Refuge, my Home.

In thee is the glory and gladness of light;
In thee is the song and the solace of might;
Whatever my changes, thy Truth will abide,
Thy Presence to guard me, thy love to provide.

And most in my sorrows thy heart is with mine,
Thou feelest my woes and thou makest them thine;
My home ever open in thy faithful breast,
A refuge unfailing with welcome and rest.

Through life as I journey I journey in Thee,
In Canaans of blessing, or tossed on the sea;
And better than these—where no storms ever rise,
I still am in Thee—Thee my home in the skies.

A CHILD'S DOLL PLAYMATES.

A PRETTY little incident in the life of a little girl is related by a lady. She writes: Viola's mamma had been to see a very poor family, where the dear little girl was very needy, and without clothes or food. When she was getting a bundle together for her, she said to Viola, "My dear daughter, don't you think you could spare one of your dolls for a poor little girl who does not own a single toy or a dolly?" "Why, yes, mamma," said Viola, "I will give the dear little girl a dolly; but I will have to talk to them and see which one is willing to go. Of course I could not part with the Princess, but the six others I will select one from." So she brought the six dolls, and sat down on her little chair and took Sarah Jane on her lap (Sarah Jane is a rag doll, and quite old), and asked, "Do you wish to leave your dear old mother, Sarah Jane, and go and live with a new mamma?"

She looked the doll all over, and then said, "No, mamma, Sarah Jane does not wish to go." Then she set Sarah Jane down on the other side of the room and took up Jack, a boy doll, and said, "Jack, do you wish to go away from me and have a new mother—a poor little girl hasn't a dear boy dollie in all the world to make her happy? If you feel as if you would like to go, just say so, and I will give you away." Jack is a Chinese, and has a frightful pigtail, and the rest of his hair stands out all over his head. "No, no, Jack, I see you shake your head; you do not want to leave your kind mamma."

So the little prattler talked to the five dollies, and not one wished to go. There was only one left, Cecile by name; so she asked Cecile if she felt she could leave, and then said to her mamma: "Cecile nods her head, yes. Well, she has been more trouble than all my family put together, and I will send her. Please tell the little girl, mamma, that Cecile has a very weak head, and that her eye sometimes falls out, and that she requires great care, and that I hope she will be very good to her, as she has lost one hand."

So Cecile was fixed up in her best clothes and sent in the bundle to the little girl. I am sure, the narrator added, they will be very happy together.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN.

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BY

MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

Summary of the Preceding Chapters.

Two charming girl cousins are introduced to the reader at the opening of the story. One of them is Annie St. Clair, the idolized daughter of Col. Royal St. Clair, in whose magnificent home, surrounded with every luxury that money can buy, she is living with her parents and her brother Roy. She has finished her education, has traveled through Europe and has seen much of fashionable life. Visiting her, is her cousin, Valeria Vernon, the daughter of the Colonel's only sister. The two girls are sharply in contrast, in character and circumstances, for Valeria is a quiet, pious, unsophisticated country girl, who has never been in fashionable society. At a garden party given in her honor, Valeria meets Dr. Gordon, a physician high in the favor of the aristocratic families, who, admiring her fresh and unspoiled nature, solemnly warns her against fashionable life, as an empty, vapid and disappointing existence. Valeria repeats his remarks to Annie who ridicules Dr. Gordon and his sombre notions and describes her own idea of what constitutes a happy life. Valeria objects that a life spent in idle self-indulgence cannot be a useful life and is therefore a wasted life. Before her return to her country home, where she subsequently marries James Carlisle, a God-fearing business man, Valeria learns that Annie is engaged to Clarence Deveraux, whom Valeria has noticed indulging somewhat freely in wine, and she warns her cousin of the danger of becoming a drunkard's wife. Annie, however, laughs at her fears and afterward marries him. The wedding festivities end tragically, for Col. St.Clair is seized with sudden illness and dies among the wedding guests. Annie's husband becomes more and more addicted to liquor, as the years pass; he loses her fortune at the gambling table, in lavish generosity and in imprudent investments, and at last dies in one of his drunken fits. She is left a penniless widow, with one child, who is her sole consolation. But he, too, dies, and Annie falls ill with nervous prostration. Her brother Roy, who shared her father's wealth with her, would gladly support her in the former luxurious style of living, but Annie is anxious to support herself, and Roy yields when her physician assures him that some occupation is necessary to her restoration to mental and physical health. She then accepts a position as music and art teacher in a girls' college. There, in a revival, she is converted and helps in the work of bringing others to Christ. One of the girls, learning where Annie lives, tells her that she knows an eminent Christian widow, named Somers, who lives in that town, and she gives Annie a letter of introduction to her. When Annie returns home in vacation she calls on Mrs. Somers, who takes her to visit several poor and afflicted families.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"I must grow."

THE visit to the bereaved mother agitated Annie so strongly that Mrs. Somers thought it wise to postpone the next engagement indefinitely. She had known Annie's past life, yet in their conversation there had been a tacit acknowledgment of suffering rather than a confession of pain. She knew there were graves dear to the young widow's heart—one a little one and most precious; yet Annie had never entered upon a recital of her griefs, had never recounted her heart throbs, her tears, her sighs. Time had partly cicatrized the wound; but here, in this desolate home, it had been torn open afresh and it bled anew. Mrs. Somers saw in the flood of tears a depth of sorrow which could not be fathomed; heard in the suppressed tumult a grief which could never be perfectly healed. With womanly tact, she postponed their visit; and, in the meantime, she went to see Annie, fearing that she had already taxed her too far, and that she might suffer from overstrained nerves. When her name was announced, Annie exclaimed:

"Mrs. Somers? Betsy, ask her right up here in my room. I can never make a parlor visitor of her, my dearest, best friend."

So Mrs. Somers sat in Annie's room in an easy chair, while footstool, fan, ice-water, everything was brought which might add to her comfort. Following Bessie's fashion, Annie sank at Mrs. Somers' feet on a cushion, and looked up in her face in evident joy.

"To think of your walking up this hill on this hot day, just to see me! You don't know how I do appreciate your visit, and how I do love you for coming."

"I am glad love greets me, for I am very sure that it was love that brought me. My dear child, you are very dear to me."

"Thank you, dear Mrs. Somers, and believe your love is returned with compound interest. How vain I am getting! I am really uneasy about myself, for I surely believe I am growing very important in my own estimation."

"Not you, dear. Love does not hurt you, neither am I constrained to believe does praise."

"Mrs. Somers, do you not form your own estimate of yourself?"

"I am not sure but that I am inclined to over-estimate myself."

"This is what I mean. Can't you stand off and look at yourself? Can't you judge of yourself impartially; say of yourself, that is a very ordinary individual. I don't like her expression; she looks peevish, cynical, morose; and, now that she speaks, she shows some absolutely disagreeable traits of character. No, I don't like her, don't think she is pretty one bit, and not one bit lovable."

"Ha! ha! Annie, you are original. No, I don't think I am good at such abstractions."

"Well, this is just the way I do. I step out of myself, stand off, take a good view, criticize myself, dissect myself, using the scalpel freely, then I jump back and try to be sweeter than ever. When I can do this, somehow I imagine that flattery does not hurt me. You see, here is a wheel within a wheel, for I'm so conceited and vain, that when I estimate myself, I have such confidence in my own judgement, that other people's opinions do not affect me, for you see I am sure I know the best."

"Well, you have a novel way of managing yourself, and I am not sure but that it is a very good one. You may contrive to keep your thoughts straight about yourself, but how do you manage with your thoughts about your neighbors?"

"That's hard. I repeat to mpself and re-repeat, 'charity thinketh no evil,' not talketh but thinketh. How few can stand the test of secret thoughts! It is not my nature to speak quickly. I deserve no credit for it, since it is not my natural disposition, but I am given to plenty of thinking, and I know from my Bible and my own experience, that it is not only those who speak that sin, but those who think as well. I am culpably guilty here."

"And I, with you, guilty before God."

"Mrs. Somers, there is one thing I have seen lately, and that is that the Christian cannot sit in supineness, for he either goes forward or backward. This is a subject which interests me greatly, just now, I believe more than any other. Last Sabbath, you remember our pastor, Dr Hammond, said the Christian was as one in a boat on a swift stream, unless he plied the oars vigorously and stemmed the current he would drift backward down the stream at a rapid rate, for there was no such thing as standing still."

"This is a very important subject, and I am truly glad it interests you so much. The Christian's cause is spoken of in the Bible as a race, a fight, and every figure in these comparisons is one indicating that great effort is required, nothing passive about it. We must run or lose, fight or be whipped. We are told that we must grow in grace. A tree that does not grow, we say, at once, must be wrong about the roots, so with a Christian. He who does not show some signs of life cannot be rooted in Christ."

Annie looked perplexed as she said:

"Growth! yet the rains and the dew and the sunshine come from heaven. The tender plant cannot produce the growing causes."

"True, all true, but human lips can ask. This is the command, and followed by the promise, 'And it shall be given you.'"

"Faith is the gift of God, Mrs. Somers, and without faith it is impossible to please him."

Mrs. Somers repeated:

"And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son . . . If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it,"

"Grace, Mrs. Somers, is God's gift, faith is his gift, growth is his to give, also. Ah! I stumble."

"The Bible is full of beautiful paradoxes, Annie. In one place it says, 'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling,' while it distinctly declares, that 'it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.' Christ is a shield, yet our Sun; the Creator and yet the Destroyer; the Life-giver, yet the Life-taker. He is our Shadow in a weary land, yet our Light; the Rock of Ages for our refuge, yet a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense; he is Bread, he is Meat, he is water, he is Wine. With us, sorrow is joy; down is up; death is life; weakness is strength; loss is gain, and defeat is victory. If we take each and trace it out we will find them all beautifully fitting. Then Christ offers us milk and wine without money and without price; yet he tells us beggars, beggars in rags with nothing to buy with,—tells us, 'I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire; that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear.' That is the sublimest faith which trusts in the dark, which cannot understand, yet accepts. Faith is the gift of God, and I am so glad that it is his to give, for I am surer of it than if I had to seek it myself. Oh! I am glad it is his to give, for he gives royally, like the King he is. It may not come as in the days of Pentecost, as with the sound of a mighty, rushing wind, but it will come just as surely, and so will come growth and strength."

"These things bewilder me, Mrs. Somers. My feeble, finite mind cannot grasp thoughts of Infinity, but tell me, do all Christians grow?"

"That which has life must in some way, at sometime show signs of life, but you ask if Christians actually grow. Some become very gnarled, very twisted, very deformed, stunted little trees. Life is possible without growth. The seeds of wheat wrapped up in the golden sheets of the shrivelled old mummy of ages ago, had life, for they grew when planted, and they had rain and sunshine: but they did not grow, they could not, when so closely coffined. So with the Christian, he must have light, the air of heaven, the dew and the sunshine."

"And if he does not grow, what then, Mrs. Somers?"

"Paul tells us, Annie, "Every man's work shall be made manifest: "for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is—'If any man's work abide which he hath built, thereupon, (the foundation Christ) he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet as by fire!'"

"How can you tell whether a Christian is growing or not, Mrs. Somers?"

"'By their fruits ye shall know them.' 'Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?' Faith, my child, without works is dead."

"How can you measure growth?"

"Not by moods of feeling, though many do try to make these the line and plummet."

"How then, Mrs. Somers? Now this is the plain, practical question I want answered: How can I tell whether I am growing or not—how can I tell whether or not I am squeezing up the little life within, until it is threatened with extinction? I can't stand still, I can't drift backward. I must grow, must get better and better, reaching forward with earnest strivings to the perfect day of development. I must work. I am not content to sit still. I have idled away, and sinned away so much precious time already—done so little for my dear, long-suffering Saviour. Now tell me, please, how I can know certainly whether I am growing or not?"

"A healthy babe grows, but there are means to insure this growth. It must be nourished by proper food, be kept from all things hurtful, and take proper exercise. So, too, a babe in Christ must be nourished by God's Word, praver and meditation on divine things; and to develop strength there must be work for Christ. One feeding thus, working thus, must grow. Fear of not growing, anxiety therefor is a sure sign of growth. The indifferent Christian, the idle Christian does not grow. 'As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine: no more can ye, except ye abide in me.—If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.'"

"I love these words of Christ. I can never read them enough, but I am not satisfied yet. How shall I know whether I am growing or not? I want to be sure."

"The Christian, my dear, has a dual nature. Paul says, 'For I know that in me (that is in my flesh), dwelleth no good thing. —For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity, to the law of sin which is in my members.'"

"Let me interrupt you just here, please. Have not unregenerate persons dual natures, too? There is Conscience, you know, and surely they must have some struggles."

"The unregenerate man cannot be said to have, as the Christian, a dual nature. Conscience with him is no guide; it is seared and ceases to admonish, and his total depravity consists in his unwillingness to obey its dictates, when this Monitor wars with his lower propensities. With him it is a struggle between lower and lower propensities. The Christian is always conscious in his mortal struggle of a loving regard for God's authority. He fears to wound him, he grieves if he has offended him; self is crushed and he is not at peace if a sinful propensity has a temporal control over him. Christ is the Christian's centre, around him he revolves. Self is the unregenerate man's; every thought is for his idol, Self; every act for his own happiness and advancement. In your own struggles and conflicts, notice which comes forth conqueror, self or grace; compare yourself now with your former self, and see if you still count sin your greatest enemy. Search your heart and see if hatred for it increases or diminishes; see if you find your love for Christ and his people languishing or glowing; whether the earth is dearer or earthly things more highly prized; whether you can bear and forbear more or less than formerly; whether a hasty temper and revengeful spirit trouble you and conquer you; whether work for Christ is loved because you love him, or because you want to pave your way to heaven with good works."

"No, no, Mrs Somers, never, never! Oh I do believe I am growing a little!

Mrs. Somers leaned over and kissed her forehead as she said:—

"I know you are, my darling, even my blind old eyes can see that. Remember that the babe never stops to inquire whether he is growing or not; he cannot see it, is the last person of all to notice any change yet, using proper means, he make rapid strides towards manhood. I said, and it is true, that a Christian has a dual nature made up of self and Christ, and as you feed and exercise one, that one grows and pushes the other into smaller space. Some Christians are so full of Christ that self wholly submerged."

"I am so glad, Mrs. Somers, that our conversation took this turn, and I thank you for all you have said, all the tests you have given me."

"By the way, my dear, one of my flock has a sick family, and I promised to prepare something suitable for an invalid appetite for them, so I must hurry back."

"Let me help you, Mrs. Somers, can I not do something?"

"No, thank you. I have all that is necessary and it it will not take me long. The family have typhoid fever; they live in a sickly part of the city, near the old pond that the city authorites have had drained lately, and I fear this may have caused the sickness."

"Can't I aid in nursing them? Please don't spare me."

"You dear, willing child, your heart prompts you to do more than your body and nerves can endure."

"Why, I am strong and well. Mrs. Somers, you dont know how much endurance there is in me! The idea of your nursing and trying to spare me!"

"Ah! well, I am accustomed to such scenes, while you are not, that makes a difference you see."

"No ma'am, I don't see it at all. I will to help in this work! and you must let me. Will you promise to send for me if you need anyone with this family? I think I shall be down to-morrow anyhow and offer my services personally."

No, don't go, I promise to let you know if you can be of assistance, so let this satisfy you for the present."

"Very well, Mrs. Somers, upon this promise, I will wait to be sent for. Since you say you must go, come down and let me offer you a green-house bouquet. I will not offer you roses, for yours shame our Geraniums, heliotropes, pelargoniums, Arabian jasmine, Azaleas, daphnes, and a variety of the most beautiful japonicas made a bouquet, the loveliest the city could produce.

THE WALDENSIAN COLONY.

It is feared that the Waldensian colony in Burke county, N. C., will suffer acute distress during the present winter. The difficulties attending the settlement of a large number of persons in a new country, are very great, and they are increased in this case by the refusal of the colonists to adopt new methods of agricultural labor, and their resolve to continue farming as they were wont to do in their old mountain homes. The consequence is that their crops have been very small, and some of the families are already living on corn-meal. The potato crop failed. A curious characteristic of the people is that they shrink from cutting down a tree, even when they need fuel.

For Your Consideration!

We desire to call your attention to FARM-POULTRY as a practical, helpful paper, devoted to the interests of poultry upon farms and in the garden plats of residents in the suburbs of large towns and villages. Do you keep poultry? No matter whether you keep one dozen or one hundred dozen; are they paying you a profit? If not, have you ever tried to learn why not? It is a fact that every hen on your place ought to pay you at least $1.50 per year. We know parties who make their hens pay them over $2.00 per hen from eggs alone.

The demand for "good" poultry and fresh eggs always exceeds the supply, and will for years to come. Then why not learn the most profitable methods of care; how men and women of large experience in the business have and are now making money? The whole secret about it is told in FARM-POULTRY so plainly that you or any one can learn by close attention and study. It is the aim of FARM-POULTRY to teach you how to obtain the best

SIX MONTHS 50 CTS.

FARM-POULTRY

breeds and crosses; how to double your egg yield when prices are high; how to market your poultry and eggs; how to build houses and yards economically. It is the best poultry paper published. It is edited by practical writers; men and women who are engaged in poultry raising for market purposes—not fancy. All of the matter which goes into FARM-POULTRY is based upon actual experience on a poultry farm. That farm is producing eggs and poultry every year at a profit, just as our paper can and will teach you how to produce, if you study its pages monthly.

Success is all a matter of care, feeding and management; and is made up of a multitude of little details, the neglect of any one of which means a lower egg yield. You can just as easily raise fine poultry like this cut as to raise scrubs. It costs no more to feed or care for them. Again, they will lay more eggs, which you can sell for a better price if you market them properly. The dressed poultry therefrom will bring from three to five cents per pound more in the markets than from second grade stock. Why not? this extra price?

The short of our editors in all the departments is to make FARM-POULTRY a practical instructor, a helpful friend, an ever-ready reference and guide to success. It is not the number of fowls kept, but the profit you can obtain from each, about which you should interest yourself. Then subscribe one year at least, and test the truth of our claim, that FARM-POULTRY will teach you how to keep poultry for profit.

THE BEST POULTRY PAPER PUBLISHED.

FARM-POULTRY is published by I. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass. One department alone "Answers to Correspondents," explains many things apt to trouble a novice and even old breeders, and is worth ten times the subscription price to any person keeping even one dozen fowl. Subscriptions can begin with any number desired. Subscribe now. You can succeed as well as any one else. What has been done, can be done again. Semi-Monthly price, One Year, $1.00; Six Months, 50 cents; Sample Copy, 2 cents. Remit cash or stamps to I. S. We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

MY PRAYER.

"Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you.'

CARE, O, my Father, take
Of this poor life of mine,
Do with me what thou wilt,
And make me wholly thine.

Take, O, my Father, take
This fickle heart of mine,
I cannot give it thee,
But thou canst make it thine.

Keep, O, my Father, keep
This weary heart and brain.
O, Father, in the midst of strife,
Do thou my soul sustain.

Thou only, Lord, canst know,
Thou only, Lord, canst see How hard the struggle is within,
Tho' calm the surface be.

Nothing but perfect faith,
And love of thy sweet will,
Can praise me from the deep
And bid me: "Peace, be still!"

Care thou! I will not care
Nor ask with troubled mind,
About my future here—
Teach me to be resigned.

Care for me all my life,
Care thou for me and mine—
Almighty Father, gracious, good,
Care thou for all of thine.

Oil City, Pa —MRS. M. E. THROPP-CONE.

VALUABLE BIBLES.

The three most valuable Bibles in the world are found in the British Museum, the National Library in Paris, and the cloister of Belem, near Lisbon. The first is in manuscript, written by Alcuin and his pupils, and in the year 800 was presented to Charlemagne on the day of his coronation. In the thirties of the present century it was in the possession of a private gentleman in Basel, who offered it to the French government for 42,000 francs. Afterwards it was sold to the British Museum for the comparatively small sum of £750. The book is written in fine, small characters, and is decorated throughout with exquisite vignettes and arabesques. The Paris Bible was purchased in 1527, printed by order of Cardinal Ximenez and dedicated to Leo X. One of the three copies, printed on vellum paper, was, in 1789, sold to England for 12,000 francs. This copy was afterwards presented to Louis Philippe, and in this way was placed in the National Library. The third, or Belem Bible, consists of nine folio volumes, and is written on parchment. It was stolen by Junot in 1807, and taken to Paris. Madame Junot, when Portugal wanted to buy the Bible back, asked 150,000 francs for it. Louis XVIII, however, made the Portuguese government a present of the precious volumes.

THE SACRED BRIDGE OF JAPAN.

One of the most attractive objects in Yokohama, writes Miss Reba L. Irvine, a missionary, is the Sacred Bridge, which rests on solid stone piers, but is a wooden structure and lacquered deep red. The gate of this bridge is locked, only being opened once a year, during the great festival. The legend says, "that when the holy Buddhist saint, Shodo Shonin, first visited Nikko and arrived at this spot, he found the rocks so steep and the flood which rushed between them so full of whirlpools, that it seemed impossible to pass over. Appalled at the sight, he fell on his knees and called fervently upon the gods and upon Buddha for aid, when, in answer to his prayer, there appeared on the opposite bank the indistinct figure of the god Shusa Daio, holding two green and red snakes, which he cast over the abyss. In an instant a long bridge was seen to span the stream like a rainbow floating among the hills. The astonishment of the saint was so great, that he doubted the reality of the miracle, but became fully convinced of the practical intervention of the god, when the bridge in another moment became covered with long grass. Feeling quite satisfied about the safety of the structure, he crossed it with his disciples, and on turning round to look at it again, saw to his wonder that the god and the snakes had completely disappeared." Such is the absurd legend still credited in Japan.

Good News—Wonderful Cures of Catarrh and Consumption.

Our readers who suffer from Lung Diseases, Catarrh, Bronchitis and Consumption will be glad to learn of the wonderful cures made by the new treatment known as Inhalation on the Aerial Plan, introduced by Drs. Starkey & Palen, Medical Associates, 1120 Girard Building, Philadelphia, Pa., and they will send you their treatise free, on receipt of your address.

For Inflammation of the Bowels caused by Cold or Wet Feet, "Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets" are a certain remedy.

The bridge is eighty-four feet long and eighteen feet wide, and although built in the year 1636, has not required any repairs of importance since.

A QUAINT OLD GRAVEYARD.

Among the quaint old churchyards in Pennsylvania, writes a correspondent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is the one at the old Tinicum Church, in Tinicum township, Bucks County, Pa., a short distance from Frenchtown, N. J. The first church edifice was erected in 1667, fifteen years prior to the landing of William Penn at Philadelphia. It was erected under the direction of Governor Printz who was the royal governor over the Swedes and Finns on the Delaware. The present large edifice is the fourth one. The original church was a Lutheran, as Governor Printz was a devout disciple of the great reformer, Martin Luther. The present church is owned jointly by the Lutheran and Reformed, and both are large country congregations. There are three graveyards. The oldest one was filled over a hundred years ago. I observed on one of the headstones dates back to June, 1736. A number of the headstones are rudely cut native stones. Even those that are marble are singular, compared with those of a more recent date.

JOHN VASSAR'S CONVERSION.†

SOME of you used to know that little man who was called by the title of "Uncle John Vassar." He was a man of God. He was not a minister, he never preached in the pulpits, but he was a man that had to win souls for Jesus Christ. He was converted when he was about twenty-five years of age, when he was at work in his uncle's brewery in Poughkeepsie. In those days people thought that a man could make beer and still be a Christian. After he was converted, John made a little rack above the vat where he was at work, on which he kept his Bible. He wanted to have his Bible there so he could study it. But soon there came an explosion. There will always be an explosion when you take the Word of God wherever there is any kind of intoxicating liquor. This one blew John clear out of the brewery, and he never went back. His wealthy uncle offered to raise his wages, and finally offered to take him into partnership, but John said, "No, I will have nothing to do with this accursed thing." He became, as he used to say of himself, legs for good men. He was employed by the American Tract Society to carry around Bibles and good books, and he used to say of himself that he was the shepherd's watch-dog. He would go into a parish and find out the minister and say, "Let us go out and see if we cannot find some lost sheep." So it was the shepherd's dog that led the shepherd. He went into the army as a tract-distributor, where he had the modest salary of twenty-five dollars a month. When the chaplain died the soldiers elected him to that position. But he was not an ordained minister, and, in order to be chaplain, he would have to be ordained. As chaplain he would get a salary of some twelve or fifteen hundred dollars. People in Poughkeepsie heard about it, and they asked John to come back, and said they would make him an ordained minister. He went back, and they called a council of the Baptist churches to ordain him. But he heard some people say that John was just like the rest of them—he would do anything to get money. So he said to the council, "Brethren, you will have to forgive me. I am sorry that you have come together in this way," and told them what he had heard. He would not do anything that by any possibility would bring discredit on Jesus Christ, and he went back to his old salary of three hundred a year.

He came into a hotel in Boston, looking for a friend, and in the parlor were two fashionably dressed ladies. He went right up to them and said to one of them, "Excuse me, madam, are you a Christian?" She said, "Of course." He said, "I didn't mean that kind of a Christian. Have you been born again?" "Why, no; we have gotten all over that in Boston; we do not believe in being born again any more." "Have you gotten all over the Bible in Boston, or do you believe that some, more?" "Oh, yes, we believe the Bible, of course." "Will you let me read it to you?" and he took his Bible and began to pour the Word of God into her heart, until her soul burned within her and the tears came into her eyes. His friend came and he had to go, but he said, "Before I go may I pray with you?" She answered, "I wish you would. He knelt down and asked God to save her there. Her husband came in afterward, and seeing signs of tears in her eyes, he asked, "What is the matter?" She said, "There has been a strange little man here. He came up to me and asked me if I was a Christian—if I had been born again; and then he preached to me and read the Bible; and, husband, I never in my life felt as I feel now." He said, "Why didn't you tell him it was none of his business?" She said, "Dear, if you had been here, you would have thought it was his business."

A FAITHFUL MISSIONARY DEAD.

From Batanga, West Africa, comes the news of the death of Rev. A. C. Good, a missionary of the Foreign Board. Mr. Good went out in 1882, being assigned to the Gaboon and Corisco Mission. During the last few years he has penetrated far into the interior on various expeditions for the purpose of selecting sites for the missions. A widow and young son, now living in Ohio, survive him. He was one of the noblest men who ever gave his life for the salvation of Africa. He stood deservedly high in the estimation of his brethren on the field and of the Board of Foreign Missions and of the Church at large.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of many wonderful successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE NATION'S GREAT HEART TOUCHED.

A Universal Response to the West's Appeal for Help—Cargoes of Food and Clothing Going Forward and Money Flowing in to Swell the Relief Fund—Sympathetic Letters from Governor Crounse, Senator Manderson and Several Congressmen—The Widespread Suffering Proved by a Mass of Indisputable Evidence.

EARLIER than expected, the appeal in behalf of the suffering farmers of Nebraska and Kansas, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has, under Divine blessing, been the means of starting a relief movement which has now become national in character and extent. Many thousands of benevolent people, throughout the entire country, have been stimulated to Christian effort and are now generously aiding the relief work with their gifts and their prayers. North, South, and East, the work of succor is being pushed with zeal and activity. Churches of all denominations, Church societies, Leagues, Unions and Sunday Schools, vie with each other in kindly sympathy, while merchants, business men, tradesmen, and humble toilers of both sexes are sending in their contributions in such generous measure that the result must be the alleviation of much suffering and the saving of very many human lives.

In a movement like the present, every moment counts and aid quickly rendered is the best aid. To expedite the work at all points, Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, has started for Nebraska where he will personally supervise the distribution of the major portion of the Relief Fund contributed by our readers through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He will visit all the principal centres of suffering, first stopping at Lincoln, Neb., the headquarters of the State Relief Committee. Our Sunday School Missionary, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, has already been sent from his post in Missouri to Nebraska, to assist in this urgent work of mercy. $1,000 of the Relief Fund have been placed in the hands of the editor of the Omaha "World-Herald," for immediate distribution, at points where the destitution is most pronounced, and nearly three hundred barrels, boxes and packages of clothing and supplies have been forwarded from our Central Relief Depot, 740-742 Broadway, N. Y., to different points in Nebraska and Kansas to be distributed by our corps of Volunteer Distributors, who have thus far done noble service in behalf of the distressed—such service as should win for them the loving gratitude of God's people everywhere. As the Relief Fund grows, it is expected that every centre of suffering will gradually be reached and the very worst cases of distress from at least temporarily assisted. While, from all accounts, the situation in Nebraska is much more widespread and serious than that in Kansas, no point will be neglected, should the generous aid of our contributing friends enable us to reach them all.

During the week, letters have been received from our volunteer distributors at Lincoln, North Platte, Stockville, Eustis, Curtis, Gothenburg, Elm Creek, Palmer, Pleasanton, McCook, Oxford, Clearwater, O'Neill, Cornell, Spencer, Box Elder, Grand Island, Malcolm, Elsie, Long City, Culberson, Westerville, Cornell, Beaver City, Dublin, Cambridge, Benkelman, Inman, Mason City, Litchfield, Arcadia, Springview, Grant, Hayden, and over twenty other points in Nebraska, stating that the relief work is progressing rapidly, and that many kind friends have forwarded clothing in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S appeal, which, together with the money sent from our Relief Fund, has been the means of helping a very large number of the destitute. The condition of the poor in the farming districts is pitiful in the extreme. There is hardly a district in which there are not

Hundreds of Destitute.

Custer county has 250 families utterly unable to help themselves; Perkins 200, Chase 225, Dundy 120, Hitchcock 250, Red Willow 100, Hayes 200, Frontier 40, Fuernas 100, Lincoln 700, Dawson 45, Keith 200, Duell, Cherry, and McPherson 40 each; Blaine 20, Boyd 250, Holt and Antelope 30 each, Keza Paha 25, and Knox 25. These numbers are on the increase, as the blizzard weather, with intense cold, has set in. Many families in remote districts have been subsisting for some time past on "prairie dogs" as their sole article of diet. The famine has driven off large numbers, and abandoned farms, sod houses, granaries, and farm implements can be seen just as their owners left them. In one section, a mother and two little children died in their cabin, and at the inquest no trace of food was found in their stomachs.

Our Nebraska distributors report that the money thus far sent them from the Relief Fund has been expended mainly in the purchase of flour, needy families averaging a sack apiece, and very large families two sacks. Groceries and clothing are also given where needed. Many of the letters are very touching, and disclose a gratitude deep and heartfelt, to the generous contributors who have aided them in the time of keenest distress. Sickness is prevalent in some sections, doubtless the result of long privation, and it is hard to realize the amount of misery the distributors encounter in many of the stricken homes, where they go with food and words of loving cheer. Everywhere they are hailed as the Lord's messengers, whose coming has been earnestly prayed for. To very many of the

POINTS OF COMPASS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, New York. Text: Luke 13: 29: "They shall come from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South, and shall sit down."

THE man who wrote this was at one time a practicing physician; at another time a talented painter; at another time a powerful preacher; at another time a reporter—an inspired reporter. God bless, and help, and inspire all reporters! From their pen drops the health or poison of nations. The name of this reporter was Lucanus; for short he was called Luke; and in my text, although stenography had not yet been born, he reports verbatim a sermon of Christ which in one paragraph bowls the round world into the light of the millennium. "They shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south and shall sit down." Nothing more interested me in my recent journey around the world than to see the ship captain about noon, whether on the Pacific, or the Indian, or Bengal, or Mediterranean, or Red Sea, looking through a nautical instrument to find just where we were sailing; and it is well to know that though the captain tells you there are thirty-two points of division of the compass card in the mariner's compass, there are only four cardinal points, and my text hails them, the north, the south, the east, the west. So I spread out before us the map of the world to see the extent of the Gospel campaign. The hardest part of the field to be taken is the north, because our Gospel is an emotional Gospel, and the nations of the far north are a cold-blooded race. They dwell amid icebergs and eternal snows, and everlasting winter. Greenlanders, Laplanders, Icelanders, Siberians — their vehicle is the sledge drawn by reindeer. Their apparel the thickest furs at all seasons. Their existence a lifetime battle with the cold. The winter charges upon them with swords of icicle, and strikes them with bullets of hail and pounds them with battering-rams of glacier.

But already the huts of the Arctic hear the songs of Divine worship. Already the snows fall on open New Testaments. Already the warmth of the Sun of Righteousness begins to be felt through the bodies, and minds, and souls of the Hyperboreans. Down from Nova Zembla; down from Spitzbergen Seas; down from the Land of the Midnight Sun; down from the palaces of crystal; down over realms of ice, and over dominions of snow, and through hurricanes of sleet, Christ's disciples are coming from the north. The inhabitants of Hudson's Bay are gathering to the Cross. The Church Missionary Society in those polar climes has been grandly successful in establishing twenty-four Gospel stations, and over twelve thousand natives have believed and been baptized. The Moravians have kindled the light of the Gospel all up and down Labrador. The Danish Mission has gathered disciples from among the shivering inhabitants of Greenland. William Duncan preaches the Gospel up in the chill latitudes of Columbia, delivering one sermon nine times in the same day to as many different tribes who listen, and then go forth to build school houses and churches. Alaska, called at its annexation William H. Seward's folly, turns out to be William H. Seward's triumph, and it is hearing the voice of God through the American missionaries, men and women as defiant of Arctic hardships as the old Scottish chief who, when camping out in a winter's night knocked from under his son's head a pillow of snow, saying that such indulgence in luxury would weaken and disgrace the clan. The Jeannette went down in latitude 77, while De Long and his freezing and dying men stood watching it from the crumbling and crackling polar pack; but the old ship of the Gospel sails as unhurt in latitude 77 as in our own forty degrees, and the one-starred flag floats above the top-gallants in Baffin's Bay, and Hudson's Strait, and Melville Sound. The heroism of Polar expedition, which has made the names of Sebastian Cabot, and Scoresby, and Schwatka, and Henry Hudson immortal, is to be eclipsed by the prowess of the men and women who amid the frosts of highest latitudes are this moment taking the upper shores of Europe, Asia and America for God. Scientists have never been able to agree as to what is the the Aurora Borealis, or Northern Lights. I can tell them. It is the banner of victory for Christ spread out in the northern night heavens. Partially fulfilled already the prophecy of my text, to be completely fulfilled in the near future: "They shall come from the north."

But my text takes in the opposite point of the compass. The far South has through high temperature, temptations to lethargy, and indolence, and hot blood, which tend toward multiform evil. We have through my text got the North in, notwithstanding its frosts, and the same text brings in the South, notwithstanding its torridity. The fields of cactus, the orange groves, and the thickets of magnolia are to be surrendered to the Lord Almighty. The South! That means Mexico, and all the regions that William H. Prescott and Lord Kingsborough made familiar in literature; Mexico in strange dialect of the Aztecs; Mexico conquered by Hernan Cortes, to be more gloriously conquered; Mexico with its capital more than seven thousand feet above the sea level, looking down upon the entrancement of lake, and valley, and plain; Mexico, the home of nations yet to be born —all for Christ. The South! That means Africa, which David Livingstone consecrated to God when he died on his knees in his tent of exploration. Already about 750,000 converts to Christianity in Africa. The South! That means all the islands strewn by Omnipotent hand through tropical seas. Malayan Polynesia, Melanesia, Micronesia, and other islands more numerous than you can imagine unless you have voyaged around the world. The South! That means Java for God; Sumatra for God; Borneo for God; Siam for God.

A ship was wrecked near one of these islands and two life-boats put out for shore, but those who arrived in the first boat were clubbed to death by the cannibals, and the other boat put back and was somehow saved. Years passed on, and one of that very crew was wrecked again with others on the same rocks. Crawling up on the shore they proposed to hide from the cannibals in one of the caverns, but mounting the rocks they saw a church, and cried out: "We are saved! A church! A church!" The South! That means Venezuela, New Granada, Ecuador and Bolivia. The South! That means the torrid zone, with all its bloom, and all its fruitage, and all its exuberance; the redolence of illimitable gardens; the music of boundless groves; the lands, the seas, that night by night look up to the Southern Cross, which in stars transfigures the midnight heaven as you look up at it all the way from the Sandwich Islands to Australia. "They shall come from the South."

But I must not forget that my text takes in another cardinal point of the compass. It takes in the East. I have to report that in a journey around the world there is nothing so much impresses one as the fact that the missionaries divinely blessed are taking the world for God. The horrible war between Japan and China will leave the last wall of opposition flat in the dust. War is barbarism always and everywhere. We hold up our hands in amazement at the massacre at Port Arthur, as though Christian nations could never go into such diabolism. We forget Fort Pillow! We forget the fact that during our war both North and South rejoiced when there were 10,000 more wounded and slain on the opposite side. War, whether in China or the United States, is hell let loose. But one good result will come from the Japanese-Chinese conflict. Those regions will be more open to civilization and Christianity than ever before. When Missionary Carey put before an assembly of ministers at Northampton, England, his project for the evangelization of India, they laughed him out of the house. From Calcutta on the east of India to Bombay on the west, there is not a neighborhood but directly or indirectly feels the Gospel power. The Juggernaut, which did its awful work for centuries, a few weeks ago was brought out from the place where it has for years been kept under shed as a curiosity, and there was no one reverentially to greet it. About three million of Christian souls in India are the advance guard that will lead on the two hundred and fifty million. The Christians of Amoy, and Pekin, and Canton are the advance guard that will lead the three hundred and forty million of China. "They shall come from the East." The last mosque of Mohammedanism will be turned into a Christian church. The last Buddhist temple will become a fortress of light. The last idol of Hindooism will be pitched into the fire. The Christ who came from the East will yet bring all the East with him. Of course, there are high obstacles to be overcome, and great ordeals must be passed through before the consummation: as witness the Armenians under the butchery of the Turk. May that throne on the banks of the Bosphorus soon crumble! The time has already come when the United States Government, and Great Britain, and Germany ought to intone the indignation of all civilized nations. While it is not requisite that arms be sent there to avenge the wholesale massacre of Armenians, it is is requisite that by cable under the seas and by protest that shall thrill the wires from Washington, and London, and Berlin to Constantinople, the nations anathematize the diabolism for which the Sultan of Turkey is responsible. Mohammedanism is a curse whether in Turkey or New York! "They shall come from the East!" And they will come at the call of the loveliest, and grandest, and best men and women of all time. I mean the missionaries. Dissolute Americans and Englishmen who have gone to Calcutta, and Bombay, and Canton to make their fortunes, defame the missionaries because the holy lives and the pure households of those missionaries are a constant rebuke to the American and English libertines stopping there, but the men and women of God there stationed go on gloriously with their work; people just as good and self-denying as was missionary Moffat, who when asked to write in an album, wrote these words:

> My album is the savage breast
> Where pagan night and darkness rests
> Without one ray of light
> To write the name of Jesus there;
> To point to worlds both bright and fair;
> And see the pagan bow in prayer,
> Is all my soul's delight.

In all those regions are men and women with the consecration of Melville B. Cox, who embarking for the missionary work in Africa, said to a fellow student: "If I die in Africa, come and write my epitaph." "What shall I write for your epitaph?" said the student. "Write," said he, "these words: Let a thousand fall before Africa be given up."

There is another point of the compass that my text includes. "They shall come from the West." That means America redeemed. Everything between Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to be brought within the circle of holiness and rapture. Will it be done by worldly reform, or evangelism? Will it be law, or Gospel? I am glad that a wave of reform has swept across this land, and all the cities are feeling the advantage of the mighty movement. Let the good work go on until the last municipal evil is extirpated. About fifteen years ago the distinguished editor of a New York daily newspaper, said to me in his editorial room, "You ministers talk about evils of which you know nothing. Why don't you go with the officers of the law, and explore for yourself, so that when you preach against sin you can speak from what you have seen with your own eyes?" I said, "I will." And in company with a commissioner of Police, and a Captain of Police, and two elders of my church, I explored the dens and hiding-places of all styles of crime in New York, and preached a series of sermons warning young men, and setting forth the work that must be done lest the judgments of God whelm this city with more awful submergement than the volcanic deluge that buried Herculaneum and Pompeii. I received as nearly as I can remember several hundred columns of newspaper abuse for undertaking that exploration. Editorials of denunciation, double-leaded, and with captions in great primer type, entitled "The Fall of Talmage," or "Talmage makes the mistake of his life," or "Down with Talmage," but I still live and am in full sympathy with all movements for municipal purification. But a movement which ends with crime exposed and law executed stops half way. Nay, it stops long before it gets half way. The law never yet saved anybody; never yet changed anybody. Break up all the houses of iniquity in this city, and you only send the occupants to other cities. Break down all the policemen in New York, and while it changes their worldly fortunes, it does not change their heart or life. The greatest want in New York to-day is the transforming power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ to change the heart and the life, and uplift the tone of moral sentiment, and make men do right, not because they are afraid of Ludlow Street Jail or Sing Sing, but because they love God and hate unrighteousness. I have never heard, nor have you heard, of anything except the Gospel that proposes to regenerate the heart, and by the influence of that regenerated heart, rectify the life. Execute the law, most certainly; but preach the Gospel, by all means—in churches, in theatres, in homes, in prisons, on the land and on the sea. The Gospel is the only power that can revolutionize society and save the world. All else is half and half work, and will not last. In New York it has allowed men who got by police bribery their thousands, and tens of thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thusands of dollars, to go scot free; while some who were merely the cat's paw and agents of bribery are struck with the lightnings of the law. It reminds me of a scene in Philadelphia when I was living there. A poor woman had been arrested and tried and imprisoned for selling molasses candy on Sunday. Other law-breakers had been allowed to go undisturbed, and the grog-shops were open on the Lord's Day, and the law with its hands behind its back walked up and down the streets declining to molest many of the offenders; but we all rose up in our righteous indignation, and calling upon all powers, visible and invisible, to help us, we declared that though the heavens fell no woman should be allowed to sell molasses candy on Sunday.

A few weeks ago, after I had preached in one of the churches in this city, a man staggered up on the pulpit stairs maudlin drunk, saying: "I am one of the reformers that was elected to high office at the last election." I got rid of that "great reformer" as soon as I could, but I did not get rid of the impression that a man like that would cure the abominations of New York about as soon as smallpox would cure typhoid fever, or a buzz-saw would render Haydn's "Creation." Politics in all our cities has become so corrupt that the only difference between the Republican and Democratic parties is that each is worse than the other. But what nothing else in the universe can do, the Gospel can and will accomplish. "They shall come from the west," and for that purpose the evangelistic batteries are planted all along the Pacific coast, as they are planted all along the Atlantic coast. All the prairies; all the mountains; all the valleys; all the cities are under more or less Gospel influence, and when we get enough faith and consecration for the work, this whole American Continent will cry out for God. "They shall come from the west."

The work is not so difficult as many suppose. You say, "There are the foreign populations." Yes; but many of them are Hollanders, and they were brought up to love and worship God, and it will take but little to persuade the Hollanders to adopt the religion of their forefathers. Then there are among these foreigners so many of the Scotch. They or their ancestors heard Thomas Chalmers thunder, and Robert McCheyne pray. The breath of God so often swept through the heather of the Highlands, and the voice of God has so often sounded through the Trossachs, and they all know how to sing Dundee; so that they will not have often to be invited to accept the God of John Knox and Bothwell Bridge.

Then there are among these foreigners so many of the English. They inherited the same language as we inherited—the English in which Shakespeare dramatized, and Milton chimed his cantos, and Henry Melville Gospelized, and Oliver Cromwell prorogued Parliament, and Wellington commanded his eager hosts. Among these foreigners are the Swiss, and they were rocked in a cradle under the shadow of the Alps, that cathedral of the Almighty in which all the elements, snow, and hail, and tempest, and hurricane worship. Among these foreigners are a vast host of Germans, and they feel centuries afterward the power of that unparalleled spirit who shook the earth when he trod it, and the heavens when he prayed—Martin Luther! From all nations our foreign populations have come, and they are homesick, far away from the place of their childhood, and the graves of their ancestors, and our glorious religion presented to them aright will meet their needs, and fill their souls, and kindle their enthusiasm. They shall come from amid the wheat sheaves of Dakota, and from the ore beds of Wyoming, and from the silver mines of Nevada, and from the golden gulches of Colorado, and from the banks of the Platte, and the Oregon, and the Sacramento, and the Columbia. "They shall come from the west."

But what will they do after they come? Here is something gloriously consolatory that you have never noticed: "They shall come from the east, and the west, and the north, and the south, and shall sit down." Oh, this is a tired world! The most of people are kept on the run all their lifetime. Business keeps them on the run. Trouble keeps them on the run. Rivalries of life keep them on the run. They are running from disaster. They are running for reward. And those who run the fastest and run the longest seem best to succeed. But my text suggests a restful posture for all God's children, for all those who for a lifetime have been on the run. "They shall sit down!" Why run any longer! When a man gets heaven, what more can he get? "They shall sit down." Not alone, but in picked companionship of the universe. Not embarrassed though a seraph should sit down on one side of you, and an archangel on the other.

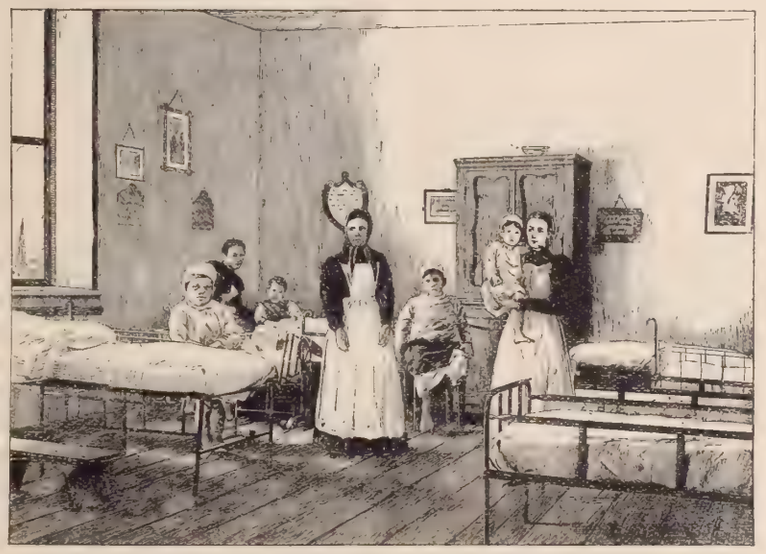
There is that mother who through all the years of infancy and childhood was kept running amid sick trundle-beds, now to shake up the pillow for that flaxen-head, and now to give a drink to those parched lips, and now to hush the frightened dream of a little one; and when there was one less of the children because the great Lover of children had lifted one out of the croup into the easy breathing of celestial atmosphere, the mother putting all the more anxious care on those who were left; so weary of arm, and foot, and back, and head, so often crying out, "I am so tired! I am so tired!" Her work done, she shall sit down. And that business man for thirty, forty, fifty years has kept on the run, not urged by selfishness, but for the purpose of achieving a livelihood for the household. On the run from store to store, or from factory to factory; meeting this loss, and discovering that inaccuracy, and suffering betrayal or disappointment; nevermore to be cheated, or perplexed, or exasperated, he shall sit down. Not in a great arm-chair of heaven, for the rockers of such a chair would imply one's need of soothing, of changing to easy posture, or semi-invalidism; but a throne, solid as eternity and radiant as the morning after a night of storm. "They shall sit down."

I notice that the most of the styles of toil require an erect attitude. There are the thousands of girls behind counters, many such persons through the inhumanity of employers compelled to stand, even when because of a lack of customers there is no need that they stand. Then, there are all the carpenters, and the stone masons, and the blacksmiths, and the farmers, and the engineers, and the ticket agents, and the conductors. In most trades, in most occupations, they must stand. But ahead of all those who love and serve the Lord is a resting-place, a complete relaxation of fatigued muscle, something cushioned, and upholstered, and embroidered, with the very ease of heaven. "They shall sit down." Rest from toil. Rest from pain. Rest from persecution. Rest from uncertainty. Beautiful, joyous, transporting, everlasting rest! Oh, men and women of the frozen north, and the blooming south, and from the realms of the rising or setting sun, through Christ get your sins forgiven and start for the place where you may at last sit down in blissful recovery from the fatigues of earth, while there roll over you the raptures of heaven. Many of you have had such a rough tussle in this world that if your faculties were not perfect in heaven you would sometime forget yourself and say: "It is time for me to start on that journey;" or "It must be time for me to count out the drops of that medicine," or "I wonder what new attack there is on me through the newspapers?" or "Do you think I will save anything of those crops from the grasshoppers, or the locusts, or the droughts?" or "I wonder how much I have lost in that last bargain?" or "I must hurry lest I miss the train." No, no. The last volume of direful, earthly experiences will be finished. Yea, the last chapter, the last paragraph, the last sentence, the last word. Finis!

Frederick the Great, notwithstanding the mighty dominion over which he reigned, was so depressed at times he could not speak without crying, and carried a small bottle of quick poison with which to end his misery, when he could stand it no longer. But I give you this small vial of Gospel anodyne, one drop of which, not hurting either body or soul, ought to soothe all unrest, and put your pulses into an eternal calm. "They shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and the south, and shall sit down."

AN OBSTACLE TO MISSIONS.

It is notorious that the morals of Portuguese, Dutch, Danes and English in the East have largely been a reproach to the Christian name, writes A. C. Thompson in his work on "Protestant Missions." Though calling themselves Christians they are such, not by holding the distinctive doctrines of our religion, but because in the general census of the world they are not classed as Jews, Mohammedans, or idolaters. Englishmen were then wont to say that they left their religion at the Cape of Good Hope on the way out, which they could pick up on the way back to Europe. What religion those men had was not likely to enrich South Africa in the meantime. Sir Monier Williams remarks, "I doubt, however, whether the worst Indians are ever so offensive in their vices as the worst type of low, unprincipled Europeans." When a certain European, who had been a terror and a disgrace to a district in Southern India, died, the natives habitually offered brandy and cigars at his tomb to propitiate his spirit, which was supposed to be still wandering about with bad intentions. It is not yet a century since Captain William Bruce wrote to Southey that if England's empire in India were overthrown, the only monuments that would remain of it would be broken bottles and corks. Schwartz declares that in his earlier acquaintance with India he sought in vain for a pious European. Later missionaries have sometimes confessed to much the same. There was not a precept of their own religion which the natives did not observe, nor a precept of Christianity which some Europeans did not disregard. What could the honest servants of Christ do in the midst of such harassing retorts as were made by the Hindus who had seen the white men's misconduct?



IN THE SICKROOM OF THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL, JERUSALEM.
From a Photograph.

Sick Children of Jerusalem.

How they are Tenderly Nursed and Cared for at the Marienstift—A Beautiful Charity.

ONE of the numerous philanthropies established under Christian auspices in recent years in Palestine is more efficient or more deserving of sympathy and kindly consideration than the Hospital for Children known as the "Marienstift," ("Mary's foundation") which is situated on the outskirts of Jerusalem about fifteen minutes' walk from the Damascus gate.

Grand Duchess Mary of Mecklenburg Schwerin was the august patroness. Children from six months old to twelve years are admitted for treatment, hundreds being taken in with their mothers and sheltered annually. Two hundred and forty-eight in all received treatment in the first three years. All who have visited the East have remarked the great number of people afflicted with diseases of the eyes. In most cases, this is directly traceable to neglect in childhood. The average number of patients per year has been three hundred, including a number of mothers. In addition to this there were many outside patients. The creeds represented by the inmates of the "Marienstift" included Moslems, Jews, Protestants, Greeks and Catholics. A majority of the little sufferers and waifs come from the great city itself, but some were from Hebron, Gaza, Nazareth and Safed and even from the land of Moab. Sick children are brought to the hospital from Christian villages by missionary societieties. A great variety of diseases is necessarily treated. It must not be imagined that medical work constitutes the sole duty of the hospital staff. School and general educational work are included wherever possible, and the Gospel is explained to listening ears and eager hearts.

The "Marienstift" has its patrons scattered all over the world—generous Christian men and women in almost every country in Europe, in America, India, and even New Zealand—and Medical Director Sandreczky having carefully preserved its purely undenominational character, has had the good fortune to secure for the institution the friendly cooperation of every governor of Jerusalem for the last twenty years.

Our illustration shows the interior of the "Sick Room" of the "Marienstift." Under Director Sandreczky is an able Medical staff, including Dr. S. Bittelreich and Dr. P. Kauffmann. The year just closed has been a very busy one, the patients increasing in number every month. The work is being steadily extended and this policy will be continued, should the institution meet with the same generous help from the good people of Europe and America it has received in the past.

MISSION WORK IN SEOUL.

Dr. John B. Busteed, an American Medical Missionary at Seoul, Korea, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"The missionaries are all in Seoul at present. Everything is quiet, we are perfectly safe, not only protected by our governments, but we are in our Heavenly Father's keeping. At the beginning of the war, the work was somewhat impeded on account of the scattering of the Koreans, due to their fear of war; but now most of them have returned and work is resumed. Korea is still in an unsettled condition. Reforms have already been started, but how they will be accepted by the people, time alone will show. During the year the Si Pying Won hospital work has proved a blessing to several thousands and is crowded with patients, especially at the time of the attack on the palace, when so many Koreans were wounded. This winter our needs are many and they include a dispensary building at the new hospital site; blankets, pieces of flannel for undergarments, cotton for bandages and quilts for winter; instruments, books for hospital library and cheese-cloth for dressings."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

The Nation's Great Heart Touched.

distributors this relief work is a new and blessed experience, for which they express themselves in their letters as thankful to the charitable donors who are enabling them to do this service "in His name." Every dollar is made to go as far as possible in the distribution of food and fuel among the suffering, many pastors, with the assistance of their church societies, devoting their entire time to it, day after day. Yet such is the extent of the distress that in a majority of the districts the relief afforded thus far has Barely Touched the Surface.

A letter from C. W. Preston of Curtis, Neb.,—the echo of many similar ones—describes the situation tersely. He writes:

We commenced giving a carload four days ago, and although we have been severely economical in distribution, Resident people from a distance of twenty miles come after supplies. The starved look upon some of the faces is indescribable. One case may serve to illustrate. A man comes from seventeen miles away, nothing to eat at home —[illegible] two days before. As he starts on his long, cold ride, nearly night, he says: "My wife and children will have nothing to eat until I get home." You do not need to be told that your gifts are very acceptable.

C. H. Brouilette of Oxford, Neb., gives this sad picture, seen on his relieving tour:

I travelled along the Kansas lines yesterday, and saw the destitution all around—the weak and dying condition of stock for want of food—saw five dead horses on one farm, and fowl, sheep and hogs in a starved condition. My heart ached. God pity poor, bleeding Nebraska's starving.

Five families, a total of twenty-three persons, were relieved by Mrs. Sarah Burton of Culberson, Neb., with her first $5 received from the Relief Fund. In almost every instance the Distributors have been equally economical. "We have relieved sixty families," writes Rev. N. S. Lowrie, O'Neill, Neb., "and have twice as many more to help." "The people are not half clothed to stand the winter," writes Postmaster Isaac Underhill, of Cornell, Neb., "They need coats, cloaks and dresses of all kinds, and clothing for children. The cattle and horses are turned out to live or die." "If every gift does as much good as this one, many poor sufferers will be made glad," is the expression of Rev. L K, McNeil, Long City.

Gov. Crounse Welcomes Aid.

An effort has been made by a certain class of real estate speculators, and other interested persons, to suppress the facts concerning the deplorable condition of the people in the western counties of Nebraska. These attempts at concealment, however, are effectually exploded by the mass of evidence that has reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, including not only a great volume of letters from sufferers themselves, but communications from many chairmen and officials of local relief committees. Gov. Crounse, in a letter dated Jan. 3, 1895, and addressed to Mr. A. M. Purdy, Palmyra, N. Y., says:

"Our people are actively engaged in supplying the needs of those who are brought to distress by reason of the widespread and severe drought of the past season, and the Legislature, now in session, will take prompt action in the matter. While the State is not asking for relief from the outside yet any donations from the charitably disposed will be thankfully received to aid in meeting the extensive need for help."

This from the Chief Executive of Nebraska sufficiently refutes the fabrication of the land speculators that no outside help is wanted, and that the State can take care of its destitute without assistance. Rev. L. P. Ludden, Secretary of the State Relief Commission at Lincoln, Neb., and the officers of over a score of local relief committees, will fully endorse the wise and humane admission of Gov. Crounse that all outside help is welcome in the present emergency.

Senator Manderson's Plain Words.

From U. S. Senator Manderson of Nebraska, a most practical letter has been received, [illegible] well worth] effectual silence the land speculators who deny the stories of suffering in that State. He writes that the statements regarding the distress have not been overdrawn. During the last campaign he was in nearly all parts of the State of Nebraska, and the partial failure of the crop in the season of 1893, followed by [illegible] total failure of crop in 1894, [illegible] has brought about a deplorable condition. The people of the eastern part of the State [illegible] have given liberally for those who are in the West, but of course their power to relieve distress is limited. He travelled over parts of the State where for a hundred miles at a stretch there was no vegetation, except what nature places upon a soil that is entirely dried up and without moisture. The condition can be readily imagined when it is stated that in Nebraska, according to the Weather Bureau, the shortage of rain during the last three years has been five feet of water over the entire State, as compared with the usual average of the twenty-five preceding years. The Senator has no doubt that this is a mere passing adversity that will ultimately do good by leading to better agricultural conditions. It will mean irrigation and the artificial placing upon land of surface and subterranean water, and will also bring about subsoil plowing. He sees no objection to trying to have the Agricultural Department, by an appropriation, send seed to Nebraska. The difficulty is that with the slow processes incident to government appropriations he fears that seed-time and harvest will both have passed away before the seed could be purchased and distributed. He proposes, so far as he is individually concerned, to send the entire quota of seeds allotted to him to the Governor of Nebraska, or to some person he may designate. He will also urge this action upon his associates in Congress.

What a Blizzard might Do.

Congressman Kem of Nebraska, writes us as follows:

House of Representatives, U. S.
Washington, January 6th, 1895.

Your letter, under date of the 4th inst., relative to the drouth sufferers of Nebraska, is just at hand and contents noted. I have to say in reply that my home is in the drouth-stricken district, and I am personally acquainted with the situation there. I have seen no article in the press exaggerating the condition of the people, and if an old-time blizzard should visit that country, hundreds, if not thousands, would absolutely perish!

As to legislation in the matter, I do not know what can be done, but you may rest assured that nothing along this line will be neglected upon my part.

Very truly,
O. M. KEM. M. C.

There is no attempt at concealment of the true situation by the Nebraska press, if we except a single newspaper in Omaha. One newspaper, "The Mason City Transcipt," says:

Once in awhile we hear somebody say that Custer county is able to take care of its own poor. The statement does not appear to be well founded when the fact is known that there are but few stores in the county that will honor an order on the county for goods. There is but one store in Mason City where a county order will be filled, and the proprietors are not anxious for many of them. All the other stores in town positively refuse to sell goods on county orders. This is the case all over the county. Will some one please explain how the hundreds of needy people of Custer county are going to have their wants for food, clothing and fuel supplied when the county's credit will not buy them.

A Pitiful Case.

The "Arcadia (Neb.) Courier" tells of a distressing case of destitution and poverty which recently came to light in that vicinity. A woman recently gave birth to a child, but there was nothing in the house to eat, no fuel and no clothing. In the course of a day or two the neighbors found out the state of affairs and provided the needs of the family as best they could, but the aid came too late. The woman died, leaving six small children, without sufficient clothing to keep them warm. She was buried Sunday in a rough, unpainted pine box.

The Omaha "World-Herald" and other leading newspapers in Nebraska are publishing details of the destitute condition of the population in the distressed sections and many are substantially aiding the relief work.

A Relief Fund Gift Welcomed.

Gilbert M. Hitchcock, President of the "World-Herald" Company, Omaha, Neb., writes to the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as follows:

On behalf of 125 families who will be the beneficiaries of your generosity, I beg to thank you for the gift of one thousand dollars for the drouth sufferers of western Nebraska tendered in your telegram of January 4th. We at once took action to make a distribution of your contribution. After consulting with Mr. Peattie, who was the member of our staff, whose letters from the drought-stricken region first advised the country of the urgent need for aid, I decided to authorize a certain man in each of twelve different counties to send me the names of the ten most destitute families in the county. In Custer county, however, we selected two men on account of the large size of the county, and in Deuel county we only asked for the names of five families for the reason that that county was not in such straits as others. I have therefore sent a telegram to each of the different counties as follows: Postmaster at Ansley, Custer county; Postmaster at Anselmo, Custer county; County clerk at Ogallala, Keith county; County clerk at Chappell county; County clerk at Imperial, Chase county; County clerk at Grant, Perkins county; Oscar Callahan, at Benkleman, Dundy county; H. A. Edghill, at Maywood, Frontier county; Rev. Palmer at Trenton, Hitchcock county; George A. Dillard at North Platte, Lincoln county; County clerk at Gandy, Logan county; County clerk at Butte City, Boyd county; County clerk at Hayes Center, Hayes county. I requested each man to give me the names of the ten most destitute families in the county by mail upon the following day, and informed him that I had $80 to be expended for provisions for those families. The only exception was in the case of Deuel county as noted above, where I asked for the names of five families for whom $40 would be expended. To-day I have received some of the answers and expect to have them all by to-morrow. We expect to spend the money for provisions, which we buy at wholesale and at the lowest possible price. We shall then ask the railroad to deadhead the shipments to the respective destinations, and I will supply you with the names of the families and their addresses.

Justice to Nebraska.

This paper has been criticized a good deal by people in Nebraska who think that our publications have resulted in damaging the State in the estimation of the east. I will therefore esteem it a particular favor and a matter of justice to Nebraska, if you will set forth in your columns the fact that such an affliction as Nebraska had last year is almost unheard of in the State, and that of the 91 counties in Nebraska, not more than a dozen are in a serious condition. The Legislature of Nebraska within the next few weeks will make the necessary appropriation for relief, including the purchase of seed grain for the spring planting. Meanwhile, it is unfortunately true, however, that contributions like yours have been needed to give temporary relief pending the necessary delay in official action.

Mr. R. H. Edwards, editor of the "Manufacturers' Record," Baltimore, writes us that a full train-load of eighteen cars each carrying twenty-five tons of coal, has been contributed by West Virginia coal miners to the Nebraska sufferers.

Appeals From Committees.

Appeals that are extremely pathetic in character, are in circulation in many parts of Nebraska, which alone would be sufficient to set all doubt at rest as to the true situation and the urgent need of help. Here is one issued by the Callaway (Custer co.) Central Relief Committee:

THE DROUTH

in Western Nebraska has reduced the farmers' condition to one of

and hundreds of families that have labored assiduously to raise a crop, are at this time on the Verge of Starvation.

Many have been assisted and have gone to their friends and relatives in other States, but hundreds of them here are without friends and their only home is the sod house on the farm, divested of all comforts; without food and without sufficient clothing to protect them from Nebraska's freezing blasts.

There is no employment here by which they can earn a living, and many, driven to desperation, have left the mother and children destitute, and gone in quest of work only to join the surging mass of unemployed. The mother unable longer to bear the cries of her children for food, is begging for help. Local relief is not equal to the demand upon it, and the Relief Committee is empty-handed ere the winter has begun.

AN APPEAL FOR AID

from the public seems our last and only resort. The press has endeavored to suppress the misfortune and misery of our people, no doubt from a desire to preserve the fair name of our State; but the pangs of hunger leave us without pride, and we humbly ask you to contribute something to these suffering people. Second-hand clothing or anything that will ameliorate their distress, will be thankfully accepted.

These people in want and misery are not idlers, but on the contrary are honest, energetic and industrious farmers who have lost their crops for two years in succession. Their condition is Simply Appalling.

Should any doubt these assertion, we refer you to our County or District Judge; or better still, we invite you to come and witness for yourself; but your assistance we ask, for, without it when winter sets in, the suffering will be indescribable, if the poor mortals do not actually starve to death. Address all donations to

The Callaway Central Relief Committee,

Our Nebraska Distributors.

They are all busy, day by day, over two hundred consecrated men and women, doing splendid work. Writing from Sumner, Neb., Mr. S. G. Wineholtz, says:

Thanks for the money sent; it was distributed among four families for groceries and other things. They were all very grateful. One family I visited did not know what they were going to do, as they had not a cent in the house. When I came they said that it was "surely God who sent me to them with the money." Another family live in a little sod-house with no floor in it, the walls plastered with clay, and the roof made from the limbs of trees and covered with sod. There are several more just as badly off. My neighborhood has twenty-five families who have to be helped. They need everything pertaining to food, fuel and clothing. One family visited did not have enough quilts to cover their little ones, and we (although poor) gave them a quilt.

Whatever you may send in the way of clothing or money I will distribute to the best of my ability.

An interesting letter comes from Mr. B. F. Armitage, Kenesaw, Neb. He says:

The destitution and suffering are great, and the suffering is caused by no fault of the poor people. I need not say what should be sent us. It will readily occur to all that grain of all kinds is needed. Clothing, flour, provisions, and coal for fuel. Donations can be sent to Luther P. Ludden, Agent of the State Relief Commission, Lincoln, Neb. Donations sent me through Mr. Ludden will be carefully distributed to the needy.

There are three months during which feed must be provided to carry the stock through the winter, and then in the spring seed and feed has to be provided, and not one farmer in four has any means to get it. I live 17½ miles west of the Missouri River, and about midway of the State from east to west. I never got my living so easy out of the soil as I have in this State, but in 1894 the heat and drouth were too much and a total failure is the result. But Nebraska will return to bless the husbandman with an abundance. But now, to save life, and relieve our distress, we are obliged to ask food, clothing, feed and seed from the charitably inclined. Haste is demanded.

One volunteer distributor, Mrs. Wm. Heath, of Johnstown, Neb., gives this account of her labors:

I used the money sent to buy flour (100 lbs). for a family that had none, cloth for a pair of shirts for a man who lost everything by drought and then hail, and a bottle of medicine for another unfortunate, the father of three little ones, who was confined to the house by sciatic rheumatism. There has been considerable clothing sent in, thanks to your kind appeal in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Desperate Fight with Poverty.

From Boyd County, Mrs. S. E. Lumpkins, Butte City, Neb., writes:

There is so much need of workers and so many to be helped. It is going so be a desperate fight with poverty in this county. Many large families are without a dollar to buy bread.

Willard Ross, Anselmo, Custer Co., Neb., writes:

I received your check. I will do my best in distributing it, or anything sent me. The people are in need of clothing to keep them warm, and shoes, most all sizes. Groceries, too, are acceptable.

This from Mrs. C. A. Bretz, Pleasanton, Neb.:

I distributed to the most needy around me, but there is much sickness and suffering here. My days are full of duty, but I will do the best I can with the aid that is sent me.

An active Christian lady distributor, Mrs. Gordon, of Merna, Neb., sends this letter relative to her work:

I thank you in God's name, and in the name of suffering humanity. Your money will do much good, and is greatly needed. The cases of want and destitution brought to my knowledge each day are appalling, and the number increases, nay doubles, weekly, and will until another crop is raised. But few families in the county have any fuel excepting cord chips, and neither clothing sufficient to be comfortable, or variety of food to be healthful. Doctors say there will be much sickness from scurvy owing to a lack of vegetable or fruit diet, such as the people have been accustomed to in former years. Our county up to the present time has been able to supply flour, but that fund is now exhausted. What will be done, God only knows. But we trust "heaven's manna" will be showered upon us in the form of money, food and clothing in sufficient quantities, that we may be able to supply the most urgent needs.

The Mothers and the Children.

Mothers have come to my house on cold, windy days, without shoes or one thread of underclothing, their babes wrapped in an old dress skirt—come to receive food, and clothing, which kind, charitable people send us, and these are ladies, members of Christian churches, reduced to poverty not from any fault of their own, but through misfortune. A lady friend came in this morning and said, "I was in a house yesterday, and the destitution was beyond anything I could imagine. There was a family of twelve and not one bed quilt in the house, the children were barefooted, and one thin covering over their bodies." I sent them all the bedding there was on hand, and a supply of wearing apparel.

Mrs. S. Shelby, Gothenburg, Neb., writes:

There are people here suffering for things to eat and wear. We have not raised crops for two years, and the people have begun to need help. Anything that could be sent would be very acceptable.

An Army Chaplain on the Distress.

Rev. Orville J. Nave, U. S. Army Chaplain at Fort Niobrara, Neb., writes:

I enclose some matter relating to the destitution in Western Nebraska. Your noble work for starving Russia, indicates what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can do for the people in this region.

Of a community a few miles from this garrison, consisting of twenty families, only two remain. The others have fled. I have personal knowledge of the situation.

Fuel is needed in some instances, as well as food and clothes. Animals will have to be subsisted entirely on the ranges, which are very barren, and in some cases destroyed by sweeping fires that have laid desolate miles and miles of country. Subsistence and seed must be provided for next summer as well as this winter. Relief should be distributed systematically by districts. The counties are organized to co-operate with those who offer help.

Unless prompt action is taken for the relief of the unfortunate people of Northwest Nebraska, great privation and distress must be suffered during this winter, and until another crop can be harvested. People living in the fertile and well-improved regions cannot imagine the situation in the arid regions of the west. They could endure a total failure of crops. By hook or crook they could get along. Their homes and wardrobes would stand a year of use, but not so here. Homesteaders have located in this arid region, where at best they can barely make a living in prosperous years, and have erected a sod-house, or a scanty frame, mortgaging their property for its full mortgage value in order to make improvements, and obtain the simplest outfit of agricultural implements. Not a fence or tree is in sight but the little they have planted or built. A pair of ponies, or a yoke of oxen, a cow, a few chickens, and a half dozen children constitute their possessions, aside from a mortgaged and not a very valuable homestead. Here they faith it through on the uncertainties of farming. When this fails, as it has this year, what are they to do? There is nothing for them but distress. They must be helped, and helped to everything, food, clothes, and seeds for next year's planting. I appeal to the people of the East for money and clothes. I appeal to clergymen to lay this before their congregations and urge them to act quickly. I appeal to Sunday-school Superintendents to lay it before their schools, to Epworth Leagues and Societies of Christian Endeavor to act at once, and be sure that collections of clothing are serviceable, and not such as might come from a mere house-cleaning.

One of our distributors, Mrs. Amy Mapes of Clearwater, Neb., writes that until help came, there was not enough in that part of Antelope County "to feed one person until Spring." She is now at work among the needy.

A Pastor's Relief Work.

Rev. A. R. Julian, Chadron, Neb., writes:

I will send your $5 by next mail to Stewart, Holt Co., Nebraska, from which point I have received, by this mail, urgent appeals for help. In many localities in our territory, our people are caring for themselves and the needy in their midst. In some counties, notably Boyd, Holt and portions of Cherry and Keyas Paha, and in some localities in all our territory the people are destitute of the necessaries of life. I am glad the Lord directed you along the way of our need. Anything you send to me will be carefully distributed, and placed where it will do the most good.

The Y. M. C. A. of Nyack, N. Y., has two boxes of clothing to Rev. H. Bross, of Lincoln, Neb., for distribution among the sufferers.

Mrs. Jane L. Goff, President of the W. C. T. U., Hazard, Neb., writes:

In sending us anything that is useful you can make no mistake. If this had been our first loss of crops, the people could have borne it. But we have had four years of drought in the last five, culminating in an entire failure the past year. So far I have received $15.00 in money, one barrel, and also one box of clothing from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and $20 and one sack of clothing from other sources. There are at least twenty-five families in our township who must be fed and clothed. All of them need bedding and clothes. These people will have no means of self-support until they can raise a crop. Remember the trainload of corn sent to the Russians by Nebraska; and now, in her hour of need, must her sons and daughters be left to suffer? I have lived among these people for fifteen years and know for myself how deserving they are of help. If anyone wishes they can write to our State President, Mrs. S. M. Walker, of Surprise, Neb., or to Mrs. C. M. Woodward, Evangelist, Seward, Neb. If you have only ten cents to give, give it. Every little helps.

"Hundreds of Silent Sufferers."

Rev. E. J. Vivian, Box Elder, Neb., gives this sorrowful picture of suffering:

I desire to thank you in behalf of the suffering people of this district. I can assure you the money will go only to the most needy and deserving. The condition of the people is very, very sad. I cannot tell you one-hundredth part of the distress and sorrow that comes under my notice as pastor of a large country circuit. There are hundreds of silent sufferers—only known to God our Father. Some families have very little more than bread and water to live on, and some families I know are eating their last sack of flour. They have not any money to buy with and, of course, if it is not given to them by kind friends they must suffer. There is quite a large quantity of clothing coming into this county; yet the demands seem as great as ever, so wide-spread is the distress.

I received a letter yesterday from a family, twenty miles away, asking if I can render them help. They seemed to be in great need for all the things of life; and such appeals come to me daily, some for food, others for clothing.

I am in a position to know that the persons assisted in any way by me are deserving. I travel over so large a country, and learn of my stewards and class-leaders of the deserving in each of their districts. I have five churches. In that way, with my personal knowledge also, I think I cannot be imposed on by designing people, but render help to those who really need.

Rev. C. A. Hale of Holdredge, Neb., writes:

I can assure you that the gifts from our Eastern friends are greatly needed, and will be carefully used. I am now engaged in raising $200 with which to buy 100 tons of coal to distribute to the destitute families of the Western part of my district. There are at least eight counties in my district over which I travel, in which are hundreds of families in want of clothing, food and fuel. Much clothing has been sent which has done much good.

C. Swanson, a Volunteer Distributor at Brayton, Neb., with $5 sent him from the Relief Fund, helped seven families with one sack of flour each, their greatest need being bread.

Clothing, Fuel, and Food Needed.

Mrs. M. L. Bundy, Wallace, Nebr., writes:

The suffering in our vicinity will be great unless we get aid in the way of clothing, fuel, and food. I am a teacher in the Sabbath School here, and my main object in life is to work for Jesus while here. Please forward goods or anything in the line of aid as soon as possible, as it is needed so badly.

Writing from Haigler, Nebr., Messrs. Allen, Johnston, and Lake, a Church Committee, make this appeal:

It is useless for us to enter into a detailed account of the destitution and suffering in this vicinity. If we don't have assistance soon, men will be driven to desperation. Whole families are not clothed fit to be out-doors five minutes in the present inclement weather. We have no fuel except what can be picked up about the cow barns. We will accept clothing or anything that will be of use to us. Anything you can send will be distributed to the most needy, and fully accounted for.

"Their Feet Tied up in Rags."

Mr. John H. Peters, Pleasanton, Neb., writes:

In going around my district, I found some of the children with their feet tied up in rags, and of course they cannot go to Sunday School or day school, etc. I truly can say, they are all in need of aid, and it is going to be still worse by Spring. What we need the most at present is clothing, footwear, and supplies.

This from John Donner, Elgin, Neb., gives an idea of what the farmers are suffering:

Our fields are as naked as the sands of the sea. We did not raise anything. Nine-tenths of us cannot buy a box of matches. If any one can send us any aid, it will be thankfully received. Stock is dying for want of feed. Those that are not sufferers cannot realize the condition.

The ladies of Gothenburg, Neb., have organized a relief society to provide clothing and food for the sufferers in their section and would be grateful for aid.

A Missionary Volunteer, Rev. K. S. Douglass, writes from Chase, Neb.:

I am doing volunteer missionary work in Chase County, Neb., and as a result learn of the great need in many homes of provision, clothing, fuel, and feed for stock. Through the kindness of brothers and sisters east, I have been able to help a number as to clothing. Yet the need is great. Being situated as we are about twenty miles from the railroad Imperial), but little aid sent there for distribution reaches us. The Baptist Church at Chase has organized their Aid Society to attend to this kind of work. As president of the Society, I would be glad to receive anything that can be used, which aid shall be distributed with the needy.

The Relief Work in Kansas.

Our Kansas Distributors are also doing noble work, as letters from McDonald, Garden City, Oberlin, Hill City, Colby, Chapman, Scandia, McPherson, Minneapolis, Lenora, Ingalls, Goodland, Russell Springs, Alton, Cuba, Leoti, Kill Creek, Gaskill, Kensington, Bird City, and many other points indicate. "We are sadly in need of assistance," writes Mrs. M. B. Capron of McDonald, Rawlins County, "and we have prayed the dear Lord to open the hearts of those who have enough and to spare to help us. Send anything in the line of seed, food or clothing. In many an attic and closet there are partly worn garments that would keep many a child warm as well as older people. There are little ones here who have worn no shoes this winter." This is echoed by a score or more other Distributors. The money sent for the Fund has purchased necessary food for hundreds of unprovided Kansan homes and bedding, fuel and clothing are loudly called for. All our correspondents agree in the statement that Kansas has never known a season of such widespread distress and suffering as the present. "I prayed over your check when it came," writes Elizabeth Adams of Gaskill, "and then started out to do the best I could with it," the result being six very needy families relieved. Wm. Walker of Goodland, states a very touching case. He writes: "There is a settlement of Swedes five miles north of Spencer (across the line), whose people have no clothing, only bushel sacks, with a string around their waists. No food fit to eat, and no fuel but cow-heaps. There are eighty families in the settlement and sixty of them are in this state and it is very cold there; and scarlet fever and diphtheria raging. One man buried four children. Many other families are losing their children by death."

"SEND THIS COAT TO SOME POOR FELLOW."
An incident at the Central Relief Depot last week.)

Senator Peffer's Hope.

U. S. Senator Peffer writes us that he has already sent 'a large quantity of garden seeds to people in Kansas and will send to every person inquiring, as long as the seeds last, and I doubt not that I shall have plenty for all of them. If I do not have enough of my own quota, I can easily procure more from Senators in the Eastern and Middle States who have large cities near them, where seeds are not so much needed. As to congressional legisiation, I do not believe it is worth while to ask it." He will, however, give a bill of that kind his most hearty and earnest support.

Hon. Mr. Broderick, Kansas, writes:

The Legislature of Kansas will meet in regular session in a few days and will certainly make timely provision for supplying the western portion with seeds. Similar action, under similar circumstances, was once taken and that precedent will be followed.

I do not wish, however, to be understood as discouraging any voluntary contributions by eastern friends, but do think unless the winter should be long and severe that suitable provision will be made by the State and local authorities to help during the winter and supply necessary seeds for spring. The Kansas representatives will endeavor to get all the help possible from the Agricultural Department at Washington. Thanking you for the interest manifested in the welfare of our people, I am,

Very truly yours, CASE BRODERICK.

Many letters from Kansas distributors have been received, but lack of space prevents their reproduction in this issue. Dr. A. E. Lapham, of Kensington, Kan., who, with the remittance received from the Relief Fund, assisted several families, writes deprecating the attempts of land speculators in Kansas, (as in Nebraska) to hide the truth concerning the suffering, through motives of self-interest. A Committee of Kensingtonians composed of Rev. J. H. Stewart, J. G. Mick, S. W. Morrill, James Blauwelt, B. D. Vessey and C. H. Greuter, certifies that there is great need of aid there.

Another distributor, Mrs. Dora E. Myers, Brownell, Kan., writes:

With your check for $5 my husband bought a small hog, and divided it between three very needy families. One had not had any breakfast on that morning and about noon they had to go to a neighbor to borrow flour enough for a meal.

Mrs. Ray Carl of Long Island, Kan., another lady distributor, was equally discriminating, although in a different way. With her check ($5) she bought shoes, meal, tea, calico, and thread for two families who fortunately had some flour. One was a family of motherless children.

Miss Clara Jellison, Secretary Missionary Society, Belleville, Kan., writes:

I have already canvassed the town for second-hand clothing or anything people could give to send to the poor, and also to distribute amongst our poor. The more I look into this matter, the more I see that much must be done for the Lord only knows what is to become of some families if they do not receive help.

Mrs. F. Slade, Athol, Kan., writes:

I have just learned of families by the score that will starve and freeze if there is not aid sent them very soon. If there should be a sudden cold spell there would be nothing to save them. My heart aches so sorely for them and have prayed so earnestly for them. I think if we, all over this blessed country, would contribute our mite, it would make quite a showing for those who are not so favored.

Mr. J. Hewitt, Oberlin, Kan., writes:

Your account of the destitution in Kansas and Nebraska is not overdrawn.

Mrs. Clara Pence, of Macksville, Kan., writes:

Your letter with draft for $5 received. There are a number here that need clothing, and second-hand clothing would be very acceptable. Several men's overcoats could be used; shoes and boots of all sizes, underwear, children's clothes, in fact anything; also garden seeds, as nothing has matured here. We need garden seed of all kinds. We have failed here two years in succession, so we feel that truly God is trying us to see if we will trust him.

Clothing the Needy Ones.

A very large number of barrels, boxes and packages of clothing and supplies have been received in response to the appeal at our Central Relief Depot 740-742 Broadway, New York, for the transportation to the sufferers. Up to the hour of going to press with this issue, every consignment has been forwarded to its destination—some three hundred different places in all. These include every article of clothing for the use of men, women and children. Besides these, a large quantity of clothing has been sent direct to the sufferers by our readers and their friends in different parts of the country, without coming via New York. This is cheering and gladsome Christian work, and these garments will doubtless afford warmth and a degree of comfort to many of the sufferers, their arrival being specially timely in view of the "cold wave" that is now sweeping over the West. One of the largest single shipments of this character up to the present time, has been that collected under the supervision of Rev. John W. Butt, of Wilmington, N. C., whose people brought in four hundred and seventy-eight garments, shoes, etc., valued at over $200, which were shipped to Rev. N. A. Axling, Gothenburg, Neb., one of our Volunteer Distributors. So generous a gift will relieve much suffering.

One of the contributors at our Central Relief Station was a gentleman who entered the office at 740-742 Broadway, and stripped off his overcoat and handed it to the clerk in charge, remarking:

"There; send that to some poor fellow out West. I can get another and this will keep him warm at any rate."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

MOUKDEN'S GREAT TEMPLE.

IN threatening the capture of Moukden in Manchuria, the Japanese are proposing to inflict a severe blow on the reigning dynasty of China. Moukden is more closely identified with royalty than Pekin. It is the burial place of many of the Emperors and there was located the imperial treasury. The city, however, and indeed the whole province of Manchuria is more densely heathen and more superstitious than China proper. The shrines to the various deities which are numerous in Chinese towns are everywhere in Manchuria. By the wayside, on the mountain paths, in every forest-clearing, the traveler comes upon these shrines, besides those he finds in the cities. They are dedicated to an endless variety of gods, each supposed to have a special department under his control. Some of them are of a malevolent character and these need to be propitiated lest they do harm to punish the neglect of the people. From these and others of a more beneficent disposition favors are expected in return for worship. Even the Confucianists, who have a sublime system of morality, are not above these superstitions, just as among Christians there are many superstitious people. In traveling in Manchuria which is a mountainous country they pay their devotions to the spirit of the hills who is regarded as an invaluable protector against accidents and against robbers and wild beasts. Another favorite deity is the god of literature, and the student about to undergo examination would have little hope of passing if he had failed to make an offering at the shrine of this deity prior to going before the examiners. Beside these there is the god of fire who deals out conflagrations on negligent worshippers and protects those who pay him the attention which is considered his due. Then there is the god of horses to whom any man who owns a horse must pay respect if he desires his horse to live and succeed. But the most respected god, the one to whom universal honor is paid is the fox. More shrines and temples are devoted to him than to any other deity. One of the most beautiful of these is that at Moukden, a picture of which appears on this page. In thus honoring the animal, the Chinese do not overlook the qualities of cunning and deceit usually associated with it. They have numerous legends about the fox deity assuming the guise of a beautiful woman luring young men to their ruin. Tailors and dressmakers are among his devout worshippers; for if he is vexed with them, he is supposed to be liable to spoil a new garment with a grease spot. But his chief business is the healing of disease. Afflicted people go to his temple to pray for recovery, with implicit faith in his power. It is a curious fact, showing what faith in anybody or anything will do for the person who exercises it, that in the temple at Moukden are many votive tablets, placed there by persons who have been wonderfully cured after praying to the fox deity. The condition of the whole people shows the urgent need of missionary work. It is true now as it was of old that men by searching cannot find out God. A revelation was necessary and this revelation is a sacred trust to be imparted to all who know Him not. (Ps. 115: 8).

Prison as a Refuge.

A prisoner in a police court in New York last week thanked the justice for a sentence of a month's imprisonment. He was so evidently sincere and was so glad to go to the Island, which is generally regarded as a very undesirable place of residence, that some inquiries were made as to his reason for being glad. He said that his life was a misery to him and he wanted quiet and sleep. It appeared that he was in the habit of getting intoxicated at intervals. Some injudicious friend of his wife, to whom she told her troubles, advised her to scold her husband thoroughly. She took the advice, and as she was very voluble, the man suffered. Whenever he came into the house, whether he was sober or not, she began her lecture, and continued it far into the night. The neighbors could hear her calling him opprobrious epithets and upbraiding him with his treatment of her. Sometimes she would scold him all night and prevent his getting any sleep at all. Entreaties and threats from him had no effect; the scolding went on, until the man declared he was going crazy. At last he threatened to commit suicide, and then his wife had him arrested. In court he admitted his drunken habits, and made no defense. The only question he asked was whether his wife would be allowed to visit him in prison, and being told that she would not, he said that he would be glad to go. He must have been very miserable before he came to the conclusion that prison life would be an improvement. We might be sorry for him if no other alternative was open to him. It is a pity that, instead of exchanging one form of misery for another, he did not quit his evil habits and so avoid both. Yet there are many who act in the same way. Although their lives are made wretched by sin and they have no hope beyond the grave, they reject the salvation of Christ which would make them happy here and hereafter, "having promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come." (1. Tim. 4: 8.)

Whiskey in a Church Wall.

The surprising statement is made by a mason, that a bottle of whiskey is concealed in the walls of a church at New Brunswick, N. J. The church was built eleven years ago, and the mason was one of the men employed in its erection. He says that it was the habit of the men to send to a neighboring saloon for whiskey every day while they were working at the church. One day, just after the bottle had been replenished, and before the men had time to drink any of it, the pastor of the church walked in with a party of clergymen to inspect the progress of the work. The man who held the bottle, knowing that trouble would ensue, and possibly discharge, if it was seen, thrust it between the inner and outer walls until the party should go. But the visitors lingered, and the men could not desist from their work without provoking inquiry. When after about two hours the visitors took their departure, the wall had been built up so high that the bottle could not be reached without tearing down a large section of the work. This the men dare not do, so it was left in its hiding-place, and thus it comes about that the wall of the church contains a bottle of whiskey. Although it can do no harm there, it seems like a profanation. However fond a man may be of liquor, the incongruity of its presence in a building consecrated to the worship of God must be apparent to him. That, however, is merely sentimental. It is much more incongruous to take the agent and curse of so much sin and misery unto the human body which should be the temple of the Holy Spirit. (1. Cor. 3: 16.)

Asking Help to Crush a Moth.

Several gentlemen officially representing the Commonwealth of Massachusetts had an interview recently with the Senate committee on Agriculture with the object of obtaining an appropriation from Congress to aid Massachusetts in her efforts to exterminate the gipsy moth. The insect, which is found to be a great pest on the continent of Europe and in Algeria, was introduced here about twenty-five years ago by a professor in Harvard University, who had an idea that it might be advantageously crossed with the silkworm. In this he found that he was mistaken, and the caterpillars which he had imported got away accidentally and proved to be the progenitors of swarms that now every year eat up the leaves of the apple, pear, cherry, and other garden trees of Malden, Bedford, Everett, and other towns in the metropolitan district of Boston. The Massachusetts Legislature has spent several hundred thousand dollars in efforts for the extermination of the pest, which affects an area of 350 miles and which might spread throughout the whole country. It is this possibility which affords the reason for asking for an appropriation from Congress. It is thought that a million dollars will be needed to rid the country of the pest. Doubtless, the professor had no idea when he let the caterpillars go, what an enormous sum would be lost through his inadvertence. But it is so in still more serious matters. No man can foresee the consequence of a word lightly spoken, or some hasty action which may have a bad influence on some child who is watching him and who may in turn influence others in ever widening circles to the end of time. (Rom. 14 : 7.)

A Disastrous Mistake.

Two young men from a country town made a blunder while on a visit to New York recently, which involved a disagreeable experience. They came to witness a football game in which some of their acquaintances were to take part. The game was won by the side to which their friends belonged and the young men assisted in celebrating the victory by liberal potations of wine. Late in the evening they bade their friends good-by and set out for the depot to take the train for home. But by that time their memory for localities had become hazy and they missed their way. After wandering around for some time they saw a police-station, which they thought was the depot. The sergeant in uniform and gold-laced cap sat at the desk and one of the young men went to him, and putting down a bill asked for two tickets. The sergeant told him he was in a police-station, not at a railroad station. He bade them begone, but they would not go and, when an attempt was made to turn them out, they resisted, still insisting that the place was a railroad depot and they would have the tickets. Finally as they became more boisterous they were arrested and locked in a cell for the night. A more ludicrous blunder could not have been made than to go to a police station, in a state of intoxication, to procure tickets for home. Yet many who are seeking their eternal home act with similar folly. Instead of going to Christ, whose mission it is to save sinners, they try to reform their lives and fulfil the law, which can punish but can never save. (Rom. 8: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Our Central Relief Depot has been Changed from 740 Broadway to No. 15 Bible House, New York.

Mr. D. L. Moody writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Ten thousand thanks to you and all your readers for their great help. The five thousand dollars that has come in from your journal has been of great help to me in the Bible Institute. May the Lord of the Harvest reward you a hundred-fold!"

Familiar Talks on Palestine are announced by Marion Harland, who, as our readers are aware, made a tour in the Holy Land, last year, for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She is prepared to give a series of four lectures on: "The Jerusalem of To-day;" "Ephrath—which is Bethlehem;" "Our Syrian Sisters;" "Olivet and Calvary." Those who have read Marion Harland's letters in this journal will know how interesting these lectures must be. Churches and Societies desiring to secure this course of lectures may address Mrs. Terhune, 479 Greene Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Nine Hundred and Ninety-nine Baptists were baptized in Hungary last year. The number of Baptists in that country has doubled since 1871.

The Christmas Sermon in St. Stephen's Lutheran Church, Baltimore, Md., was preached by Rev. J. G. Morris, D.D., who is over ninety-one years of age. The venerable preacher gave a most powerful and vivacious sermon.

From a Recently Published Volume of statistics compiled by Prof. A. H. Newman, LL.D., of Toronto, it appears that between the years 1790 and 1890, while the population of the United States increased about sixteen fold, the number of Baptist communicants increased nearly fifty-seven fold and the Methodist eighty-one fold.

In Reporting the Results of a meeting of colporteurs recently held in Tokyo, Mr. Loomis, the Japanese agent of the American Bible Society, writes: "The business people, or merchants, as a class dislike Christianity, because of the ethical teachings of the Bible." A legitimate inference from this fact is not very creditable to the integrity of the merchants. The Bible requires only fair dealings.

A Remarkable Experiment in Church Union is being tried at Lenox, Mass. The Congregational, Methodist, and Episcopal churches are holding monthly union services that call out large audiences and are proving profitable. The meetings are held in the churches by turn, the choirs uniting.

At a Service in the Church in Madagascar which the Queen attends, she made a public prayer on the Sunday after the French relations were ruptured. The Queen prayed for the deliverance of her country from the plots of her treacherous and unscrupulous enemies, declaring that her sole trust was in God. The people, who were deeply moved by the Queen's prayer, added a hearty "Amen."

An Extensive Revival is in Progres at Yonkers, New York, as the result of the labors of Rev. B. Fay Mills. Neighborhood prayer-meetings are being held, and an interest is manifested in religious matters by people who have not heretofore been seen at church. At the closing meetings two thousand persons were present. Mr. Mills has now taken up his pastorate at Albany, N. Y.

A College Settlement has been Founded among the mountains of North Carolina. Miss S. C. Chester, a graduate of Vassar, has taken up her quarters in a log cabin, about three miles from Asheville to work among the mountaineers. One or more helpers will stay with her at intervals. Clubs and classes for the children and a library and reading-room for elders will be opened, and in other ways religious and educational work will be done. Miss Chester has made preparation for her work by a study of the College Settlements in cities.

The Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, is satisfied with the new departure it made three years ago. It decided to adopt the free pew system and to make special efforts to reach and evangelize non-churchgoers. During the three years, two hundred and seventy-three new members have been added to the church. All the expenses of the church have been met and there is a balance in hand for the new year. The income was sixteen thousand dollars, besides four thousand contributed for benevolent purposes. Dr. Charles L. Thompson, the pastor, considers the free church experiment a decided success.

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 3. Luke 9: 28-36. Golden Text Matt. 7: 5. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE apostles had continually to unlearn as well as to learn. Peter, after his great confession of Christ as the Son of the living God, had undergone the sharpest rebuke which any disciple of Christ had experienced, because, after receiving a revelation from heaven, he still looked on things with earthly eyes, and judged of Christ's announcement of his coming sufferings from a human and carnal standpoint. And Jesus had taught the great lesson that he that would save his life (i.e. spare himself) should lose it, but he that would lose his life, i.e. deny himself, and not spare himself, should save it, or "find it." It was the old teaching of death for life. But death should be only a way to life, the crucifixion and the shame should lead to the kingdom and the glory; and Jesus told them, "Of a truth, there be some of them that stand here, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God," or "till they see the kingdom of God come with power."

It was a week after Peter had acknowledged him to be, "The Christ, the Son of the living God," and had also taken upon himself to rebuke his Lord when he spoke of his sufferings, his death and resurrection that "Jesus took with him" Peter, and John and James, and went up into a mountain to pray. He needed to the transfiguration; should he take Peter, who had so signally misunderstood him? Yes; for "He himself knew what he could do" with this chosen vessel.

There was in Jesus intense love to his disciples: "Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end." It was not that weak, selfish love which would spare them suffering, because it cost Him too much to see them suffer; but it was the unselfish love which never wavered, never lessened under all their misunderstanding of him, all their earthly mindedness, all their strife, the one with the other, the denial of one, the forsaking of all, and thus, having rebuked Peter, he now, in his patience, trusts him again.

The disciples were accustomed to the prayerfulness of Jesus. You cannot live many days with a man or woman of prayer without finding out the secret of his or her life. But on this occasion, something unusual happened: "As he was praying, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment became white and dazzling." "He was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his garments became white as the light." The glory of an earthly throne had filled their horizon, position at an earthly court was their high ambition; to see a crown of earthly gold upon their Master's head, and to see him arrayed in the gorgeous insignia of royalty; such was their dream. But to see his face, instead of being surmounted with a crown, transfigured with a glory like the sun itself, and the humble peasant-garments which he wore, not replaced, but themselves lustrous as the light—this was new indeed, and most unexpected, it was above and out of the line of, all their conceptions. He had [illegible] to tell no man that he was the Christ. But he let the gleam of light from the unseen world visit them that they might not be stumbled when it came to shame and cross, death and burial, with him whom they had left all to follow. And at the same time it should enable them to bear witness of him, as did Peter afterwards when he wrote: "We did not follow cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eye-witnesses of his majesty For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; and this voice we ourselves heard come out of heaven, when we were with him in the holy mount." (II. Pet. 1: 16-18, R.V.)

But their Master was not alone; others were with him, heavenly beings, but perfectly recognizable. "Behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory and spake of his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem." Just that which Peter would not hear of, that of which he had said, "Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall not be unto thee," filled the thoughts of these two holy men of old as they appeared in glory with the Christ for whom they had looked! Did the three disciples understand? Did the real meaning of their Lord's kingdom dawn upon them? They were dazzled, but not fully enlightened; and while the glory of their Lord had wakened up men whom they had thought of as dead, the three disciples were heavy with sleep! They were not yet in a condition to bear the glory of his kingdom And there are visions of Christ's glory which come into the lives of his children, but which find no response from them because they are not sufficiently at the disposal of their Lord, because they have not learned what it is to live exclusively for him; they see, but they remain asleep.

Moses and Elijah understood, what in their earthly lives, had not been fully revealed to them. They had indeed "sought and searched diligently," prophesying of the grace which should come unto us; they truly searched "what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did point unto, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow them. It was indeed revealed to them, that not unto themselves, but unto us did they minister these things: but now the light had dawned upon them, and while the chosen three of the chosen twelve slept, the holy intercourse between the Christ and these princely ones of his kingdom went on; for that the glory of a kingdom into which fallen man should be introduced, could come about in no other way than the way of the Cross, the utter condemnation of the flesh It is impossible to have an eye for the true glory of God, of Christ, and of his Church, without going down with him to the Cross, and being, in our own eyes, as well as God's, "made a curse" (Gal. 3: 3), with him in being crucified with Christ (Gal. 2: 20), by the the fact of his having identified himself with our sin and shame, when he died for us and was "made sin for us" Much of the holy intercourse between Jesus, Moses and Elijah was lost upon the disciples through their sleep. "But when they were fully awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him? But as they were parting from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles: one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah, not knowing what he said" When men speak involuntarily they often reveal the true bent of their hearts: Peter's idea was a narrow and selfish one; the vision of the mountain suited him better than the teaching of the Cross a week ago. Now he had found what he could rest in, but it must be shewed [illegible]: if this was to be the manner of Christ's kingdom, then let it be always thus: no cross, no more suffering, but always blessed spiritual intercourse with heavenly beings. Oh, how many there are who seek to preserve or to produce some spiritual enjoyment which has come to them during some special revelation of God to them through his Word or by his Spirit! they meant everything to be stereotyped and kept in store for their own personal enjoyment, and they have not entered into the very purpose for which Christ died. "He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again."

While Peter said these things, a cloud overshadowed Moses and Elijah. It was a quiet but a solemn rebuke. God does not give his heavenly visions for man's personal enjoyment. He would not have suffered Moses and Elijah to visit earth again except with a purpose which should establish the kingdom of his Son. The very moment Peter seeks to appropriate the heavenly vision for personal enjoyment, the heavenly vision fades; such visions cannot exist in an atmosphere of self pleasing.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AN early tradition, dating from the fourth century, locates the scene of the Transfiguration on Mount Tabor, and three churches, realizing the aspiration of Peter, have been built there, to commemorate the event. But doubts as to the accuracy of the tradition are aroused, when the topography of the country is compared with the record of the events occurring before and after the supernatural appearance. Modern scholars are now generally agreed that Mount Hermon was the scene of the memorable event This mountain is not like Tabor a solitary peak, but the southern end of the Anti-Lebanon range. It rears its snow crowned head 9376 feet above the level of the sea and is the highest mountain in or around Palestine. To this mountain Jesus appears to have led his Apostles about a week after Peter had made his great declaration of faith in his Master's divine origin. Luke says it was about eight days after; Matthew says six, probably counting only the intervening days. With his three most intimate disciples, Jesus begins the ascent, leaving the others at the foot. As they did not return on the same day, we may infer that the ascent commenced after noon and they were on the mountain all night. The Transfiguration probably took place in the early dawn. The three disciples had apparently fallen asleep, but were fully awake at the time of the change. Christ was praying when his face became radiant and even his garments shone with heavenly light. Two beings in luminous guise like himself, were with him. They were recognized by the disciples as Moses and Elijah, but how, we are not told The whole scene, the change in Christ's appearance, the coming of the two visitors, and the subject of conversation—all had a purpose. The disciples were perplexed by what Christ had told them of his approaching humiliation and death. It was so contrary to all they expected of the Messiah. They would be still more perplexed when they saw his suffering and disgrace. They would need support for their faith, and Christ gave them beforehand this opportunity of witnessing his inherent glory, that when their trial came, they might still be sure, in spite of appearances, that he really was what they had believed him to be. There was another purpose, too. John who was an eyewitness wrote many years afterward, for the encouragement of persecuted believers: "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him." Paul saw Christ, too, in his glory and was blinded by the sight. He wrote with full knowledge of the meaning of his words: "Who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

The fashion of his countenance was altered. The story is told of a famous woman that when she was a child her mother found her in tears one day after her return home on her vacation from boarding-school. The mother, after some questioning, learned that the child was grieving over her lack of beauty. She had been snubbed at school by her playmates, and some distinguished visitors to the school had petted and praised the pretty girls, but had taken no notice of "that plain child." Was it to be so all her life? The child understood that beauty was everything in a woman and she was in despair. Happily, the mother was a woman of tact as well as of piety. She impressed on her daughter the superior value of goodness "Be good, do good, be kind," she said, "and although you may not be beautiful you will be loved." The child heeded. Her life was a continual effort after holiness. Sorrows came upon her and she learned patience and cheerfulness in adversity. Prosperity came and she was kind and benevolent and sympathetic. Responsibilities came upon her and found her conscientious, self-sacrificing and ready to sink herself in her work. When she was an old lady and sat at a great ceremony among women who had been her friends in childhood, a great artist saw her and begged permission to paint her portrait. "Nearly a hundred faces were before me," he said, "faces of women younger than herself and of others of about the same age, but there was none so beautiful as her's. They expressed frivolity, or ambition, or sordid spirit, but her face was the face of a sweet and lovely soul. Her character shone through. She was the most beautiful woman there." Of more than Jesus it has been true, that as they prayed, the fashion of their countenances has been changed.

When they were fully awake they saw his glory. (R.V). This privilege was given to the disciples for their support and encouragement in the ordeal before them. Jesus had been with them for fully two years, but they had never seen him thus glorious before. People are not quick to perceive spiritual and moral beauty. The ostentatious man, the man who is always elbowing his way to the front gets the admiration of the public and the modest man who is really good is unrecognized. Hawthorne has a story of a valley in which the cliffs had a fancied resemblance to a human face of exquisite beauty. There was a legend in the valley that the greatest and noblest man of his generation would be born in that valley and that he might be recognized by the resemblance of his features to the great stone face. Many children were born in the valley, left it in their youth and returned at maturity or old age and the people looked at each but the legend was not fulfilled. One man returned with wealth and built a marble palace and gave away much money and the people thought this was the promised man, but his face was wrinkled and his eyes greedy not like the great stone face. Another who had been a soldier and had won fame in battle returned as general and again the people thought their greatest and noblest man had appeared. But not so. At the banquet given in his honor it was seen that his face was too fierce to be like the great stone face. Many others returned as the years passed. A statesman came who had won fame and power, but his features were gloomy and suspicious and had not the cheerfulness of the great stone face. A poet came and there were signs of greatness in him but there were marks of dissipation on his face and the great stone face was remarkable for its purity. The people were losing hope when they discovered that a man who had lived among them all his life doing good to all, humble, kind, gentle, ready to serve any one, and beloved of all, was the man they had been looking for. The poet called their attention to the striking resemblance between his features and those of the great stone face. Purity, gentleness, goodness, all were there. They saw it at once and wondered that they had not seen it before.

Feared as they entered into the cloud. Many have quailed before impending trouble, although they were sure that Jesus would be with them in it. There is a fear that is all physical which refuses to be subdued by the most courageous spirit. Brave soldiers have often experienced this fact. Paxton Hood says that he once met a distinguished naval officer who told him that he owed to Admiral Ball what was dearer to him than life. "When he was Lieutenant Ball," said the officer, "he was the officer under whom I went on my first boat expedition, being only a midshipman in my fourteenth year. As we were rowing up to the vessel which we were to attack, amid a discharge of musketry, I was overpowered by fear, and seemed to be on the point of fainting away. Lieutenant Ball, who saw the condition I was in, placed himself close beside me, and still keeping his face toward the enemy, pressed my hand in the most friendly manner, and said in a low voice: 'Courage my dear boy, you will recover in a minute or two. I was just the same when I first went out in this way.' I declare to you, Sir," said the officer, "it was just as if an angel had put a new soul in me."

Gospel Minstrel of the Sea.

muel Medley, the Sailor-Singer, and his Melodious Christian Life.

SACRED song is one of the most effective weapons in Gospel warfare. Samuel Medley, the pious British midshipman, after his conversion in 1767, finding an irrepressible vein of spiritual song in his soul, began to write hymns. I remember, says a riter in the "Sailors' Magazine," how it ed to stir my young soul in the days of y boyhood in the revival meetings. Most the hymns then sung were of the deeply lemn sort, such as, "Oh, there will be ourning, mourning, at the judgment-seat Christ." But when the people struck up e jubilant notes of "Loving-kindness," ey sounded like a carol of larks after the otings of an owl. Not only did pastor edley read his newly composed hymns om his pulpit, but he had them printed on aflets or broadsheets. A poor little blind rl sat on the steps of the church and sold em for a half-penny to the congregation s they came out from worship. The child rned her livelihood in this way, and one the pieces she sold to her customers was at glorious hymn, "Oh, could I speak the atchless worth." After the hymn floated er to America, Dr. Hastings composed r it his splendid air of "Ariel," and to that will be wedded forevermore. Happy is at hymn in that it is wedded to an inspiring ne! Another of the pieces which the litе girl sold began with the words, "Jesus, ngrave it on my heart."

Medley had the gift of rapid composition. One day when visiting at the house of Mr. hilips in London, he said to the daughter f his host, "Betsey, will you bring me ome paper and ink?" He retired to his oom, and presently came back and handed o Betsey his famous hymn of "Loving-indness!"

The good old sailor-singer ended his useful life on the 17th of July, 1799. During is last sickness he talked in the racy lanuage of the sea, and spoke of himself as a poor, shattered bark just about to gain the lissful harbor, and oh, how sweet will be he port after the storm!" He imagined himself looking at a compass, and repeated o himself, "A point or two more, a point r two more. Dying is sweet work, sweet work.' As he drew near to the heavenly harbor he exclaimed, "I am looking to my Dear Jesus, my portion, my all in all. Home, home, hallelujah!" With these triumphant exclamations the old sailor in Christ's royal navy swept, with colors flying, into the heavenly port.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN CALIFORNIA.

The Pacific Gospel Mission is conducting a valuable mission work among the "unchurched masses" in Los Angeles. It is an undenominational mission and is located in the most populous part of the city, on Second street. Among the features of the work are: home visitation, cottage prayer-meetings, Gospel wagon-service, Sunday morning breakfast, a sewing school, and an employment bureau. At some of the tent meetings, remarkable conversions have taken place, and criminals have been recalled to sober, honest lives. For a time the Gospel Union Mission tried the experiment of furnishing a simple meal of coffee and bread only, to all who had tickets, and numbers came, and remained to a Gospel meeting, and on one occasion fifteen promised to lead a new life. Seventy have found employment. The Mission is supported by voluntary contributions. S. I. Merrill is president and C. S. Mason superintendent, both having long experience in mission work of this character. Its work has commended it to the support of the best Christian people in Los Angeles and its opportunities for extending in usefulness are limited only by the resources at its disposal.

"GOD'S GRAIN."

THE page bears but a single line;
And yet the gentlest, truest friend
Who ever mingled tears with mine,
With her sweet hand the sentence penned
I scan in puzzle and in pain,—
"Our Lord is gathering in his grain!"

Within my sight two graves were heaped,
But yesterday, with cruel clods;
The sharp and sudden scythe that reaped
In my home-meadow—was it God's?
The blast that swept my lilied plain,
His way of gathering in his grain?

Man's reckoning is not thine, dear Lord!
From grapes unripe who wrings the wine?
With flowing corn whose barns are stored?
In summer's prime we strip the vine;
In autumn pile the mighty wain,
And gather fully ripened grain.

"God's grain,"—she wrote, and then,—"His
With tactful skill the truth is phrased [own;"
His chosen seed, in weakness sown,
To be in strength immortal raised.
Who early sows, with latter rain,
Knows when to gather in his grain.

From frosts that blight; from droughts that
The very life-blood from the roots; [draw
From canker-worm; from tempests raw
That bruise, then harden, tender shoots;
From earthly hap; from earthly stain,—
In loving haste he saves his grain.

Thrice-blessed sheaves! with them he fills
His stately chambers, strong and fair;
The while the everlasting hills,
And boundless reach of sun-steeped air,
Thrill with the Harvest-Home refrain,—
"Our Lord has gathered in his grain!"

TRUE FRIENDSHIP.

JOHN 15: 13, 14.

A Life laid down to save a friend—
No greater love than this can be;
Yet Jesus suffered to the end,
And poured his life out on the tree,
That heaven's door might open wide
For those He knew before He died,
Were not His friends.

And though he loved and suffered so,
His offered friendship oft' we spurned;
And often grieved his heart, we know,
As from his outstretched hand we turned:
And yet in spite of all our sin,
He said we might new lives begin,
And be his friends.

At last there came one glad, sweet day,
A torn hand pulled the barrier down;
Jesus took all our sins away,
And pointed to a golden crown,
He captured, by his matchless love,
Those, who so long against him strove,
And we were friends.

Sinner! thy Saviour calls to-day:
Come to thy God, He'll pardon thee;
Hark! Jesus saith, "I am the way
And no man cometh but by me."
If my commandments thou wilt do
And love as I have loved you,
Thou art my friend.

NEW MILLENNIAL THEORIES.

The Light Shed on the Character of Christ's Millennial Reign by the Organized Rebellion at its Close.

ONE of the most remarkable features of prophetic study is the new light that is continually breaking from the old books. Although learned and earnest men in many generations have studied the prophecies and written about them, the subject is not exhausted. Closer and more systematic study reveals facts, the existence of which, was not previously suspected. A case in point is found in the articles on the Millennium which have recently appeared in this column. They were extracts from longer articles appearing in an English journal, which again are chapters from a book shortly to be issued in London by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. While we cannot endorse the views expressed therein until certain difficulties are explained, and the book in which they are advocated has been examined, there is a plausibility about the theories and an apparent scriptural basis for them which demand respectful and fair consideration.

It is not so very long ago that the great body of Christians had no more precise idea of the close of this dispensation than was conveyed in the phrase, "the end of the world," or "the Second Advent." Everything was vague and indefinite. More than that, the event was dreaded. So different was the attitude of the church to the attitude of the Seer of Patmos, who so far from being appalled by the terrible judgments he had been describing, wrote as his final word, "Even so, come Lord Jesus." It appeared then that what was desired by the Apostle was dreaded by the Church. The anomaly suggested thought and a new examination was made to find out the cause, for there was a presumption on the face of it, that there must be misunderstanding somewhere. The result was the promulgation of the doctrine of the rapture of waiting Christians. It was found that the Scriptures did not teach a time of persecution, bloodshed, and of fearful tribulation for the whole church; but that Christ would appear in the air and summon to him there all his waiting people. They would be caught up to meet him suddenly. There in peace and safety they would have a refuge while Antichrist persecuted all such of Christ's people who were not caught up. These would be Christians who had been leading worldly lives, and who were not worthy of the privilege of translation. Afterward, at an interval of some three, four, or seven, years Christ would come to the earth for a thousand years.

The view now put forward by Mr. Trench opens another vista beyond. A mysterious statement is made (Rev. 20: 7.) that Satan is to go forth at the end of the Millennium to resume his work of temptation. It is this statement that sent Mr. Trench on his expedition of exploration and induction. The common idea was that the glorious reign of Christ for a thousand years would be the golden age of the earth—a period of unalloyed happiness, peace and holiness. How then could it be that Satan would find dupes and victims at the end of it, and that he would apparently be so successful in organizing a widespread rebellion against God and his people? Mr. Trench answers the question by propounding a new view of the Millennium. He believes that Christ will reign by sheer force. That opposition to him will be rigorously suppressed, but it will not be eradicated. Men's natures will not be changed. They must perforce submit to him, but they will do so unwillingly and against their inclinations. After a thousand years of Christ's rule it might be expected that the world would have learned how much better was the reign of Christ than the reign of evil; but they will not learn the lesson. Satan inspires them with the courage to rebel and organizes a gigantic combination to wrest the world from Christ's dominion. Then occurs the battle of Armageddon at which, by supernatural power, Antichrist is overthrown and Satan finally excluded from terrestrial affairs. This is the programme which Mr. Trench submits for the consideration of students of prophecy.

ADVANCE!

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Feb. 3. Ex. 14: 15:31; 15: 1, 2.

ON an anniversary the mind naturally turns backward as well as forward. It will be so on this day, in this and many lands. In fourteen years how much has Christian Endeavor accomplished! Out of that small seed sown in one corner of our land how majestic a tree has grown! What a mighty force has sprung into existence from that simple unostentatious effort! In thousands of towns the young people are now banded together for Christ and his Church. An army two million strong is enlisted in the service. Mutual helpfulness and aggressive influence have come from the organization, and the possibility of the united co-operation of the sects has been demonstrated. The world sees now that below the rivalries and jealousies of sectarian difference there is essential unity. It has been found that love to Chist and loyalty to him are a sufficient bond of brotherhood to hold his people together. If Christian Endeavor has accomplished nothing more than to provide this basis for union of effort, it would have merited the hearty gratitude of Christendom.

But the new watchword is needed. The pioneer work is done; the army is enlisted and organized; its power has been tested and proved. what shall be its work? The command to the Israelites is the command to this new army. The word is "Forward." And it must be an advance on the old lines. If any are looking to the Christian Endeavor movement for a union of the sects and an obliteration of denominational divisions they will be disappointed. If any are expecting from it a political or social movement for the suppression of vice, drunkenness, or public immorality they, too, are deluded. The work of the Society must be on the principle of the Master—the reformation of society by the reformation of the individual. It is by the ones and twos added to the army that good will be effected. It is by the spirit of tolerance and love in the hearts of the individuals that the denominations will be drawn closer together. Under the most efficient government and the wisest legislation the sinner will find opportunities for his sin if he desires to commit it. The hope of getting a clean city and a sinless world lies in eradicating that desire. We may insist on legislation to suppress the open temptations to sin, but Christian Endeavor will fail if it seeks to make men moral by law. Friends of the movement who are urging this plan of campaign on the Society are unwise. The work of the Society will be successful only as its aim is kept to its true line of personal and individual effort. To turn one sinner from the error of his ways, to win one brother from worldliness to consecration seems a small achievement compared with the gigantic task of winning the world for Christ; but every one counts, and it is so that the Christian Church to-day exists. Legislation never helped it. On this line by patient, persistent, prayerful effort, let us advance.

THE EMERGENCY.

Acknowledgments are made in another column of various gifts of clothing, blankets, etc., from King's Daughters, Christian Endeavor and other church societies, for the destitute people in Kansas and Nebraska. The response to the appeal made on this page recently, is very gratifying. The societies will be glad to hear that it will not be necessary for us to pay the freight of the clothing to the West. The American Express Company, desiring to co-operate in the work of charity, is making no charge for conveying the goods from [illegible] Worthy and reliable people, city missionaries, Sunday School missionaries, and other Christian workers, who have extensive opportunities of knowing who and where the most needy are, have undertaken to receive and distribute the gifts free of charge. How sorely they are needed may be seen from the letters we have published from the people of the afflicted States. These are only a small part of those we have received. The majority do not come from the sufferers themselves, but from people who have seen the destitution and know how severe it is. There is no need to plead the cause of the needy with the societies. We need only say that the necessity is dire and urgent, that thousands of our brethren and sisters with their little ones are in the midst of the severities of a Western winter, without food and fuel, and with nothing but rags to cover them. We are sure that their condition will appeal to the heart of every follower of Him who bade us feed the hungry and clothe the naked.

BISHOP R. K. HARGROVE.
President of Epworth League of M. E. Church, South.

THE SOUTHERN LEADERS.

Members of the Epworth League in all parts of the country will be glad to see the two portraits which adorn this page. They are the portraits of the chief officers of the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. In this, as in every organization of its kind, while the main reliance must always be on the local and church company, the success of the organization as a whole depends very much on the men at the head of it. Inspiration and stimulus and direction must come from them. They are its leaders, and as the soldier looks to his general for the plan of the campaign, while doing his humble duty in the ranks, so the Epworth Leaguer hopes that the work he does will be turned to effective purpose by his leaders. The Southern branch of the League has been singularly fortunate in its choice of men for all the higher offices, and particularly so in the selection of its President and General Secretary. Bishop Hargrove and Dr. Steel are specially qualified by their learning, talents, and [illegible] responsible [illegible] and [illegible] may be expected from the League under their leadership.

Robert Kennon Hargrove, D.D., is sixty-six years of age, in the ripe vigor of a long experience in ministerial work. He is a native of Alabama, in which State he was educated and served his first appointments. He was converted at the early age of eleven years, and is a conspicuous example of the enduring influence of piety begun in childhood. It was not until his twenty-eighth year that he entered the ministry. His first license came from the Tuscaloosa Conference, and was dated December, 1857. He served on the Macon circuit, and subsequently held appointments at Summerfield, Greensboro, and Mobile. Kentucky had his services at Lexington, and Tennessee at Franklin, McKendree, Nashville, and Clarksville. Dr. Hargrove has also had considerable experience in educational work. He served in the University of Alabama as Professor of Mathematics, and was for some time President of Centenary Institute, and of Tennessee Female College. He was elected Bishop in 1882. He has won the admiration of his section by his stalwart Christian principles, his unswerving integrity, and his large liberality in supporting the various enterprises of the church.

Rev. Samuel Augustus Steel, D.D., is one of the best-known ministers of the Southern Church. His visit to New York in 1888 as a representative of his branch of the church to the General Conference will not soon be forgotten. His address on that occasion thrilled his critical audience by its commanding eloquence and the sterling good sense which it showed. The Northern church perceived that the South had a man of might in its ranks whom any section might be proud to number among its leaders. Dr. Steel is in the prime of life, having just entered his forty-seventh year. He comes of ministerial stock, his father having been a traveling preacher of the Methodist Church. His early years were years of hard toil on a farm in Mississippi. The studious boy had to snatch his education from intervals in cutting timber, driving oxen, and following the plough. But the real grit in the lad could not be kept down by physical toil. He had been converted when he was fifteen years old, and two years afterward, under a regular license, he preached his first sermons to country audiences. Two years more on the farm and then he was ready for college. Emory & Henry College, Virginia, was the institution to which he went. He speedily made his mark among his peers, and, while still an undergraduate, was appointed chaplain to the University of Virginia. At the close of his course the Virginia Conference gave him an appointment at Broad Street Church, Richmond, where he labored for three years. Since then he has been called to several important spheres of work. At Columbus, Miss., Memphis, Tenn., Louisville, Ky., Kansas City, Mo., and Nashville, Tenn., he has done excellent service. During all this time Dr. Steel's pen was busy, and his high reputation as a preacher was less than his reputation as a writer. His clear, vigorous, pungent sentences stirred the hearts of thonsands of readers who had not the advantage of hearing them, and his name became known far and wide as an active and consecrated Methodist. At the last General Conference at Memphis, Tenn., when the duty of filling the office of General Secretary of the Epworth League came before the Conference, Dr. Steel, although not a member of the Conference, was elected. With this office he combines that of editor of the "Epworth Era," the organ of the Southern League, and has proved in editorial chair, as on the platform of the League, the same stirring, stimulating, inspiring leader.

DR. S. A. STEEL.
Secretary of Epworth League of Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

The Albany, N.Y., Young Men's Christian Association building, of which we published a picture recently, was destroyed by fire on Dec. 25. It was situated in the business portion of the capital. The building was a gift to the association from James B. Jermain. It was worth $25,000. The insurance will not cover the loss.

The Junior Christian Endeavor movement is making rapid progress in New York City. The Junior Local Union was organized in 1892 with twenty-four societies. Mr. W R. George, who has worked among children for the past five years, was the first president. During the past year under the presidency of Mr. Percy J. Ryan, there has been an increase of one hundred per cent. in the number of societies. Junior Superintendents have been appointed over the districts into which the city has been divided according to the constitution of the Young People's Societies. The Superintendents and the officers of the Junior Local Union meet on the Second Saturday evening of each month in the Madison Avenue Reformed Church to discuss plans for the advancement of the work.

Around Jerusalem.

Pretty Village of Kulonieh in the Suburbs—A Historic Valley.

BOUT an hour-and-a-half's walk from Jerusalem westward, and almost in a direct line between that city and Ramleh, the traveler descends into and crosses a deep valley, at the west point of which is a quaint Eastern village. This is the village of Kulonieh, and it reached by paths that wind in and out among the hills, affording glimpses of picturesque mountain scenery, almost as fine as those to be found in Switzerland. Kulonieh lies in the very heart of ground almost every foot of which is consecrated to sacred history. To the north lies Nebi-Samwil the ancient Mizpeh, where old prophet Samuel was buried); immediately eastward is the village of Ain-Karim, where, according to tradition, John the Baptist was born; at the bottom of the valley which is situated on the extensive Valley of the Terebinth, is the brook Elah, in whose pebbly margin the young shepherd-warrior of Israel gathered the stones with which he slew Goliath. Every foot of the old roadway, shown in the foreground of the illustration) is sacred to Bible memories. From Kulonieh to Jerusalem is an uphill journey, and as the traveler proceeds, hallowed memories crowd upon each other and he can picture in imagination the Ark being borne upward in triumph to Mount Zion, with the priests and the people following. Along this same highway, Jesus and the two disciples probably walked together on the way to Emmaus. Roman cohorts have swept past and Roman legions have marched on this highway, and Titus, too, have passed the hosts of the Crusaders and Saracens, tramping into clouds of dust the white thoroughfare along which, centuries before, the fragrant beams of cedar were carried for the erection of Solomon's Temple.

There is a great charm for the tourist in this part of Palestine, so quietly beautiful and retired, and yet so near to the Holy City itself, the seat and centre of life and activity. Here and there a dwelling may be seen that shows signs of comparatively modern construction, but in the main, the houses, and the bridges, like the mountains themselves, bear evidence of antiquity. Groves of olives, and rows of terebinth and sycamore trees give variety of color to the verdure of the sloping hillsides, while the brook in the valley goes on its way quietly singing as though the world had stood still since the day when its pebbles furnished the ammunition for securing the triumph of Israel over its enemies.

In a Japanese Parlor.

If a man of taste should enter a Japanese parlor, he would not fail to be surprised at the display of marvelous and exquisite taste. Yet, says an observant Japanese native writer, I have often heard the saying of foreigners that "The Japanese house has no furniture, and is absolutely cheerless and empty." This is quite wrong. I must say that such have no taste for the Japanese art; for the men of taste are agreed in saying that the art of decoration in Japan is excellent. If anyone has any taste in this art, he will perceive that the hanging picture on the "toko" wall, the elaborate arrangment of flowers, pictures on the framed partitions and all decorations, however trifling, reveal infinite taste. The gorgeous display of colors in the rooms of Western people would please our children to look at. Drawing-rooms piled up from corner to corner with toys, shells, stones, dishes, spoons, and different novel things remind us of our curio shops. A bunch of flowers is stuck in a vase without form and without order! The pictures in the rooms hang perpetually, though the face of nature and feeling of man change from time to time! All these sights which we are accustomed to see in the European house excite in us nothing but wonder. Yet this is the taste of your people; we have no right to criticise it.

Physical Culture and Morality.

We are beginning to recognize the fact that there is more in mere physical exercise than we have considered, writes Miss Carrie Rand, Instructor in Iowa College. We are wont to be much of the opinion of a legislator from the agricultural district of one of our neighboring States, who, when spoken to upon the subject of erecting a gymnasium for young women, said that girls in his district had exercise enough without anything of that kind; they swept and dusted, and milked cows. But we are beginning to see that exercise to be most beneficial to the body and mind alike must be not only a complete change, and bring into play muscles not generally used, but must also be enjoyable. Unless the element of pure enjoyment comes in, the natural functions of the body are arrested through the influence of the brain. Also our exercise must be ennobling. We cannot set a high mark before ourselves and make all our work tend to build up to it, and then let slip into our recreation and exercise elements which undo the good.

A Hint to Mothers.

An eminent teacher was asked recently what she considered the greatest obstacle nowadays in a girl's education, and she promptly replied, "Their mothers." She then explained that the school in which she taught nominally opened in October, but that a large contingent of the pupils came straggling back as late as the middle of November. In May or early June off they flit again, and meantime the Christmas holidays intervene, when the girls engage excessively in social gayeties, which use up their vitality and leave them unfit for study. We then inquire how they ever learn anything under such a regime, and again the teacher promptly replied, "They don't!" In many cases it is the mother who is at fault. She insists upon having her daughters attend festivities and parties, claiming that such forms of recreation are an essential part of her education. The real purpose of education, without neglecting proper exercise and recreation, should be the unfolding of the moral and intellectual nature.

WHEN BABY SINGS.

WHEN baby sings I seem to hear
The music of the angels near;
The melodies she must have heard
Before she came, our little bird.

The brooklet's voice the song of birds,
Are sweetest sounds, though lacking words,
And baby's song, though but an air,
Is music true, divine and rare.

When baby sings, so soft and low,
I'm in the land where flowers grow,
Where violets shy peep through the grass
And breezes kiss them as they pass.

The robin and the bobolink,
The meadows sweet and river's brink,
The rustling leaves and cooling springs,
All come to view when baby sings.

CHILDREN AND THE SABBATH.

TO bring a child into habits of loving and reverent Sabbath observance is a matter of training, writes Rev. C. H. Trumbull, and that training ought to begin at a very early age of the child, and continue throughout the years of his childhood. Long before a child can know what is the distinctive idea of the Sabbath, or why it is to be observed in a manner peculiar to itself, he can be trained to perceive that one day in seven is different from the other six days, and that its standard is higher and its spirit more joyous; that its tone is quieter, and its atmosphere more reverent. And all this ought to be secured to every child in a Christian home, from the very outset of a child's training to its close. Even a dog, or a horse, or an ox, learns to know and to prize some of the privileges and enjoyments of the Sabbath; and an infant in arms is as capable as one of the brutes of receiving an impression of truth in this realm of fact and sentiment. But in the case of an infant or of the truth everything depends upon those persons who have it in training.

It is for the parents to make clear the distinction that marks, in the child's mind, the Lord's day as the day of days in the whole week's history. The child may be differently dressed, or differently washed, or differently handled, on that day from any other. Some more disagreeable detail of his morning toilet, or of his day's management, might on that day be omitted, as a means of marking the day. There may be a sweeter song sung in his hearing, or a brighter exhibit of some kind made in his sight, or a peculiar favor of some sort granted to him, which links a special joy with that day in comparison with the days on either side of it. As soon as the child is old enough to grasp a rattle or to play with a toy, there ought to be a difference between his Sabbath rattle or other toy, and his week-day delights in the same line. By one means or another he should have the Lord's day to look back upon as his brightest memory, and to look forward to as his fondest anticipation. And in this way he can be trained to enjoy the Lord's day, even before he can know why it is made a joy to him. A child is well started in the line of wise training when he is carried along as far as this.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Sowing and Sunshine.

NOTHING but the very tenderest attention was shown Annie in her brother's family. His wife was completely won over by Annie's affection and gentleness, so that now, she vied with her husband in little acts of love and consideration. It was Annie's house, yard, and flowers as well as theirs, they insisted; and she, in her turn, had too much delicacy of feeling, and thorough appreciation of the kind spirit which prompted the assurance, to contradict it. To the little ones, "Aunt Annie" was the model of patience and forbearance, the nurse and entertainer for the sick ones, the playmate and doll-mantua-maker for the well ones. Two little pets, Roy and Annie, composed the nursery department. At the time we write, Roy was five and Annie three; both perfect in form and feature. Here, within this home circle, the young Christian's influence was being felt, and here her light gleamed out brightly in the worldly darkness which shrouded this fashionable family. Roy's wife cared little for parties, therefore there were few at their house, but every theatre was frequented, and the care of the children gradually fell to Annie.

"We'll have a dood time to-night," said little Annie one evening at supper, "tause mamma's doin' out."

This innocent speech might have caused some feeling on mamma's part, only it struck all as so ludicrous, even to the clapping of the little fat hands that accompanied it, and there was a merry laugh from all.

"So you are glad mamma's 'doin' out,' are you, pet?" asked mamma with a kiss.

"Me sorry 'bout that, but Aunt Annie talks so feet, me aint sorry but a 'ittle bit."

It was stories from the Bible, about Samuel and Joseph, and all the old worthies that made the children's eyes so big and bright. When Aunt Annie stayed, they sat up a little longer and everybody was glad when Auntie's night came, she, nurse, children, and mamma.

"Annie, your influence over our little Annie is beautiful" said father Roy one day. "She was beginning to show lots of human nature in her composition, but lately she has changed; for, as she says, she has learned to 'fight herself,' and she does it, too. Well, if my children will only become as sweet and good as you are, I am willing for them to be religious."

So the seed was being sown. The example of the young Christian was having a telling effect. Frequently her brother Roy would go with her to her own church, and occasionally his wife would join them; and in the afternoon they all looked on with a smile when, each Sabbath, she prepared Annie and Roy for Sunday School, and then took them by the hands and led them to the infant class of her own church. Annie argued that though little Annie was very small, nevertheless she sat perfectly quiet, and it did neither her nor any one else any harm for her to go; then, besides, it gave her mamma an hour's rest.

On the Monday following Mrs. Somers' visit, as Annie was culling some flowers for the parlor vases, a little boy handed her a note which ran as follows:

"MY DEAR ANNIE:—I promised to let you know if you could be of service to the Mason family, who, you remember, are quite sick. The mother was taken with fever yesterday, which makes the third member of the family stricken down, a grown daughter, a little girl, and now the mother. The father must have his rest so as to work all day, for he is their only available support. Now, if you are perfectly well, come round and let us see what arrangements we can make for the night.

With warmest love, M. G. Somers."

Quick the roses fell into the vases, and quickly Annie changed her dress for a plain [illegible] of heliotrope and rose-geranium leaf at her throat, she started for Mrs. Somers', leaving word that she would not return till morning.

There was something particularly sweet and attractive about Mrs. Somers' cottage for Annie. The white frilled curtains swaying to and fro were so cool, everything seemed sweeter, purer, calmer here than anywhere. The water was clearer and colder; the breezes were fresher and balmier, and the white clouds seemed to pause and rest overhead like a sweet, never closing benediction.

"How quickly you came!" exclaimed Mrs. Somers, as Annie stepped in bright and rosy.

"Love lent me wings," said Annie. "I am so glad you sent for me."

"We have quite a distance to walk, dear. So let us make an arrangement at once, for we must hurry as the clouds threaten rain. I am so sorry that this is not my night to sit up, as I would like to be with you!"

"Have you been sitting up regularly, Mrs. Somers, and yet never sent for me before?"

"Well, my child, I really have not needed you till to-night. Mrs. Wilkins, a neighbor of Mrs. Mason, is to sit with you to-night. There is not much to be done, only to watch and give nourishment and water when wanted. They are a family above want, but since they are in trouble, I have provided you with a lunch in this basket: they will have coffee for you."

"How thoughtful and kind in you, Mrs. Somers."

"You see I have been in such places before. You will only need your supper, you must eat breakfast with me. I shall wait and watch for you. Come, let us start."

They passed Mrs. Wilkins' house and found her getting ready to go over and spend the night with the sick, Mrs. Somers having made the engagement. As they stopped a moment at the gate, she called out:

"I can't come over, Mrs. Deveraux, till after supper as my husband does not get home till late from the store; but Mr. Mason will sit up till a late bedtime. You know I cannot leave the children until Mr. Wilkins gets here, but I will come as soon as possible."

"Suppose you take a nap while you're waiting, Mrs. Wilkins," said Mrs. Somers, "and then let Mrs. Deveraux sleep towards day; but wake her up before you leave, for she is to breakfast with me."

"Very well, then, Ma'am, I'll do that way. Suppose I come about one and let Mrs. Deveraux sleep till day, will that suit you?"

"Any arrangement will suit me," said Annie. "I did not expect to sleep at all, however. Expected to be up all night and I am fully able to do it."

"Mrs. Wilkins' plan is the best," said Mrs. Somers, "so we will consider that that is agreed upon and go on."

On reaching the house they found the wife quite sick; the daughter, in the next room, better, and the little baby girl quite restless and fretful. The father was at home, and doing all he could in an awkward way. His greeting to the ladies was very cordial, for he was evidently very glad to have their help. The clouds were so very threatening, Mrs. Somers was compelled to hurry back, much to her regret and Annie's, too.

"We are going to have a stormy night," said Mr. Mason. "It's been so awfully hot all day, I expect there'll be mighty sharp lightning. You've never nursed much have you—don't know much about sickness, I expect?"

"I have had some experience in sickness and I love to nurse," replied Annie. "You are greatly afflicted just now, Mr. Mason."

"Yes, Ma'am, I am. Don't know when I ever did have such a time in my life before. I've got a fine doctor, though, the best I believe anywhere about—Dr. Gordon, do you know him?" But not waiting for a reply, he went on: "He left a paper with directions written on it, for anybody that might sit up to follow to-night. Here it is."

"He said he was called out in the country to a bad case, but would be here about dawn. He said all was doing as well as could be expected, and that the fever had to run its course—whew! what a flash, and no rain! That was dangerous! Just listen at that clap! It's going to be a terrible night. What's the arrangement for the night?"

"I am to sit up until midnight, then Mrs. Wilkins will come and we will remain together."

"She's a mighty good nurse, Mrs. Wilkins is. I wish I could help you, but unless I sleep I can't work to-morrow, but you can call me any time you want me. I'll be right close. Here's coffee down by the fire and a cup over there and sugar I reckon. If little Ginnie wakes up she'll fret for her ma, and I expect you'd better call me. Oh! Me! It's a sad time for me and for them. Worse for them than for me. If I get the fever we are all gone up."

"Oh! I trust you will not have it, Mr. Mason, it would be indeed terrible for you to fall sick. You had better lie down and try to sleep, now while they are all so quiet. There is no telling how soon I may have to arouse you."

"But I hate to leave you by yourself in this storm."

"I don't mind it. I am not timid about lightning, so don't remain up on my account."

After a little more persuasion, he left, went into the next room, and in a minute, it seemed to Annie, she heard him breathing heavily, in deep sleep. She was alone.

The wind howled fearfully without. Flashes of lightning blinded her through the partly closed window blinds, and the thunder pealed so long and loud, and reverberated with such tremulous roar that the window-panes rattled so, she feared the sick might be startled. She sat watching the lightning flashes and measured the distance of the cloud by counting between the flash and peal; but presently she remembered her supper, and thinking that this might be her best opportunity for enjoying it, she opened her basket. What a nice lunch! Her repast was just finished, her coffee drunk, and the fragments cleared silently away, when little Ginnie aroused and asked for water. Annie gave it to her, then awakened Mrs. Mason to take her powder. She was glad they had waked up, for time was dragging rather heavily. No book to read, no one to talk to, only her thoughts on a stormy night to keep her company, and these she did not find very entertaining. She wondered if Dr. Gordon would come! What a noble man he must be! She always thought he was a nice man, but somehow he never seemed to like her, never paid her much attention, never sought her society, rarely came unless invited, though he was always included in invitations. She thought he and Val would fall in love, but they didn't. Now they say he is in love with the young lady lately visiting Captain Roland's family.—Well, that's all right. No doubt she is worthy of him. I know she is, or he would never have selected her for his wife.—Somehow she wished he woutd come the first half of the night, for it was lonesome and dreary. Very dreary with the wind roaring and rain pelting without!—Only listen to that peal! Wonder it doesn't wake them up, but how soundly they sleep! No more powder now till twelve, for its just ten now.—Don't care to meet Dr. Gordon anyhow. He was a former friend and it's better not. What a strange description Mrs. Somers gave of him! Said he was a man gentle to every thing and a perfect gentleman."

Little Ginnie roused just here and wanted to be rocked, so Annie relieved at this break in the monotony of the tedious night took the child into her arms and rocked her. The little one opened her eyes and saw it was a stranger; but, by this time, she had grown accustomed to changing her nurses, so she closed her eyes again and sank into a sleep, while Annie pillowed the little curly head on her arms and rocked her very gently. It was company for her to hold the little one in her arms.

How it stormed! There had been a lull, but it seemed only a cessation to gather more strength, to rush on with increasing fury. Quick, vivid flashes fast followed each other, and the thunder hardly ever died away, for it was one loud, long, shaking peal! Presently one flash lighted the room, seeming like great balls of fire floating in the air, when just as the thunder was dying and muttering, the sound of feet striking off mud upon the steps reached her. Mrs. Wilkins is early, she thought, and what a terrible storm she has come through! She turned her head as a soft step approached, but instead of Mrs. Wilkins, there stood Dr. Gordon!

"Why, Miss Annie, you here?"

"I believe I am, doctor. Good evening," and she smiled at his surprised face.

"Is there no one here except yourself?"

"No one, sir."

"How came this? It ought never to have been managed this way; some one ought to be sitting up with you."

Annie then explained the arrangement while the doctor listened attentively, and then he persisted in saying:

"This is all wrong, all wrong!"

"No, I agreed to this plan; it is all right sir. I hope you do not suppose me so delicate as not to be able to sit up with the sick."

Dr. Gordon made no reply, but turned towards the window, through which the came a blinding flash.

"Alone, and in this storm! This enough to set every nerve in your body quivering. I have never witnessed a severer storm, and here you are all by yourself, sitting up with three sick people! I fe out of patience with this inconsiderate arrangement."

"You pay me a poor compliment, Dr. Gordon. You think I am no account, fit to nurse your sick, but I think, sir, I worth a little more in the world than I or was."

Dr. Gordon was passing his fingers lightly over Ginnie's head; then he pressed pulse and pronounced her better. Then turned to Mrs. Mason, found no percepti change in her, but declared the grow daughter almost out of danger. An made her report of what she had done, a said:

"It is time now for the next powder, dear little Ginnie is sleeping so sweetly hate to disturb her."

"I will prepare it, Miss Annie, you n not disturb the little thing."

"He mixed the powder, gave it to M. Mason, raising her head and laying it b gently, with a woman's soft touch. T he walked back to Annie and stood lo ing down at her as she rocked to and with the sick child, until the silence bec painful. At length he said:

"Let me relieve you of little Ginnie, Ms Annie. I will hold her in my arms; sl too heavy for you, and you look tired."

"I am not tired in the least, Dr. Gor I love to hold the dear little, feverish ling. She is company for me this dre night."

"Dreary! I should think it was dre Poor company, too, an ill child! I ha patient not far from here, Miss Annie am going over to see her now, then I coming back, and if Mrs. Wilkins is here by that time, why I—you shall sit up alone. I shall take care of you few hours anyhow."

A Valuable Book.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact recognized by physicians, that a very large majority of the diseases of mankind begin with irritation and inflammation in that part of the body which becomes affected by the disease. Inflammation is an unhealthy condition of the tissues, manifested externally by heat, redness and swelling, internally by congestion of the blood vessels, causing pain, disease and growth of unsound tissue. It is very important that every person should understand the nature and home treatment of inflammations. For this purpose, I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston, Mass., have had compiled from the highest medical authorities for family use, an illustrated book, entitled "TREATMENT FOR DISEASES." The book contains a description of all ailments caused by or accompanied with inflammation, alphabetically arranged; also the treatment for such. The book is printed in plain, simple language that all can understand. It is a valuable and complete treatise which everyone should have for ready reference. The publishers will send one copy in paper covers, to any person on receipt of their name, address and a two cent stamp for postage I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston

Isaac B. Davis, New York, says: "Why is the number 13 so unfortunate and how did the belief originate?"

It had its origin in the fact that thirteen sat at table at the "Last Supper." The belief that the number is unfortunate is entertained by the superstitious only. Intelligent people should give no heed to such notions.

Subscriber, North Sterling, Ct.: What is the meaning of the initials A.U.C. used in reference to dates?

They refer to the era from which the Romans reckoned as we date from the birth of Christ. They are the initials of the words "Anno Urbis Conditæ," or "Ab Urbe Condita," meaning, from the founding of the city, that is, Rome. It corresponded with 752 or 753 B.C. or 2647 years ago.

Old Subscriber. How many rooms are there in the White House at Washington?

Eleven state rooms in all, viz: the East Room, Blue Room, Red Room, Green Room, State Dining Room, Family Dining Room, Ante-Room, Library, Cabinet Room, and two state bed-chambers. The Red Room is used as the private family parlor. On the second floor are the executive offices and the private apartments of the family.

Sincere, Curwensville, Pa. Is there in the Bible any command prohibiting us from conversing with our departed friends by table-rapping or otherwise?

There is a command to the Hebrews to abstain from cognate practices. (Deut. 18: 10-12.) Isaiah also reproved the people for resorting to persons whom we should now call mediums—"wizards that peep and mutter." and he asks, "Should not a people seek unto their God?" (Isa. 8: 19.) You are doubtless aware that a large number of the people who profess to give others opportunity of conversing with departed friends have been proved to be frauds.

Reader, Canada. I have no doubt THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches many young men situated as the writer is, with no opportunity of attending church, or of meeting with Christian people; I should like to propose the start of corresponding society, which I think would be very helpful. If all who are interested in such a proposition will send their names and addresses to THE MAIL-BAG, (including Reader, Canada, who makes the suggestion) THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to put them in communication with each other for mutual spiritual improvement.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies: but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hear-say, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00 according to the size of the bottle ordered.

RETROSPECTIVE.

HOW many old years
Have you seen depart?
And can you look back
With a loving heart
To deeds of kindness,
That you have done
For the sake of Him
Who gave his Son?
Have you done what you could,
In kindness and love,
To point fallen man,
To the kingdom above?

Have you studied the Bible
That tells us the way?
Have you knelt many times
Unto Jesus to pray?
Have you thanked Him for bread,
For water and air:—
I'm sure that you ought to,
He's kept you with care;
Or have you been selfish,
Not caring to know
The fountain from whence
All our great blessings flow?

In the year just begun,
Will you live like the past?
Why won't you but try
To reach heaven at last?
We all were created
Some small niche to fill.
We only can do it
By doing His will:—
Then choose the right way,
Do all that you can
To lift up, and cheer up
The down-fallen man.

Bradford, Pa. J. W. FRITTS.

ON THE ROAD TO EMMAUS.

ıe Highway Where Jesus Overtook and Talked With His two Disciples, After the Resurrection—The Village on the Heights—Scenes full of Tender Memories.

EAVING Jerusalem by the Western gate, the sojourner in Palestine finds himself on a smooth broad Roman highway which leads across a plateau whose level stretches are dotted at intervals with country-houses, most of them of comparatively modern aspect. As he advances, the ground becomes more hilly and from the top of some of those rolls he can command a wide prospect, the eye ranging as far as Bethlehem. Forty minutes further walking brings him to a lovely valley, with a gentle ascent to the northwest and on the distant height stands the village of Emmaus. To the right, only a few miles away, can be seen the village of Lifta, and on the other side, and about equidistant, Kulonieh, which was described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week. In the bed of the valley flows a stream, along whose banks are fragrant orange and lemon gardens, olive groves and neat enclosures, interspersed with very comfortable-looking houses. By this pleasant picture the traveler is tempted to linger; but Emmaus, no less attractive on the height above, and of far greater interest by reason of its associations, urges him onward.

It may have been along this road, somewhere between the valley and the heights beyond, that the Saviour joined the two disciples who, while travelling to Emmaus, were earnestly, yet sadly, discussing the tragic event that had occurred in Jerusalem. Luke tells the story with a clearness of circumstance that bring the scene vividly back to view. We picture, in imagination, the surprise of Cleopas at the questions put by the Stranger, whom they supposed to be ignorant of recent remarkable occurrences which to them were of absorbing interest. Their surprise deepened to wonder when He began at the writings of Moses and explained to them, in order, all the principal passages both in the books of that great legislator and the writings of the other prophets, relating to his own sufferings, death and glorious resurrection. There were, doubtless, no less astonished at his authoritative interpretation of Scripture than at his familiarity with all that Jesus did and suffered; yet their eyes "were holden" during those miles of converse, and they failed to recognize their beloved Master. With child-like simplicity they told the Stranger their inmost thoughts concerning Jesus, not even concealing their perplexity at the news that had come to them and to their associates of his resurrection. Their hearts warmed to him as they listened to his words of comfort and encouragement, and their love for such a welcome companion found expression in the invitation to share their evening meal. It was only when he revealed himself in the breaking of bread and then disappeared out of their sight, that they realized that they had indeed been conversing with and entertaining the risen Christ.

Those events alone have ever since that day made the old roadside to Emmaus and the village itself sacred to the hearts of his followers the world over. The incident near Emmaus, simple in all its details, was the starting point for the public proclamation of the great fundamental Christian doctrine of the resurrection, for the favored two did not keep the good news to themselves. Hastily leaving the untouched meal, they returned to Jerusalem and told the rest, whom they found still in perplexity, sorrowing and disconsolate. They were told in return that Jesus had already appeared to Mary and to Peter, but still there were doubters. The experience of Cleopas and his fellow disciple confirmed in their minds the truth of the glorious reality of the resurrection and any lingering misgivings were forever set at rest by Christ's appearance to the company of disciples.

Emmaus, in many respects, is probably little changed to-day from the Emmaus of New Testament times. Its buildings are constructed on the same model, its surroundings have the same general aspect and the dress and customs of its villagers are practically unchanged. Although the sloping hillsides and valleys of this section of Palestine are stony and sterile, they are not altogether barren, and the presence of occasional orchards and clumps of olive trees redeems the landscape from dullness. Emmaus is prolific in ruins, but they lie scattered about in the shape of innumerable boulders that once formed part of the buildings of a place of considerable note, which in the days of the Crusaders was the site of a castle built to command the pass to the Holy City. All around are memories of the heroic Maccabees, for the village was fighting ground and is on the highway to Jerusalem. Not far distant is Latrone, embosomed amid orange orchards and noted, in native legend, as the birthplace of the "penitent thief."

Emmaus is of great antiquity, and is held by some authorities to be identical with Nicopolis. Josephus, the Jewish historian, refers to it as Ammaus, a place where Vespasian had a garrison of eight hundred troops. Biblical commentators in the fourteenth century believed that the little village of Kubeibeh, about three miles west of Neby Samwil was the true site of Emmaus, while later writers have regarded the village of Kuriet-el-enab as the real location. The modern accepted site shown in the photograph is generally agreed upon by the majority of Bible investigators, and fulfils every requirement of the sacred narrative.

THE DANGERS OF PESSIMISM.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, New York. Text: Psalm 116: 11, "I said in my haste, All men are liars."

WINDLED, betrayed, persecuted David, in a paroxysm of petulance and rage, thus insulted the human race. David himself falsified when he said, "All men are liars." He apologizes and says he was unusually provoked, and that he was hasty when he hurled such universal denunciation: "I said in my haste," and so on. It was in him only a momentary triumph of pessimism. There is ever and anon, and never more than now, a disposition abroad to distrust everybody, and because some bank employees defraud, to distrust all bank employees; and because some police officers have taken bribes, to believe that all policemen take bribes; and because divorce cases are in the court, to believe that most, if not all, marriage relations are unhappy. There are men who seem rapidly coming to adopt this creed: All men are liars, scoundrels, thieves, libertines. When a new case of perfidy comes to the surface, these people clap their hands in glee. It gives piquancy to their breakfast if the morning newspaper discloses a new exposure, or a new arrest. They grow fat on vermin. They join the devils in hell in jubilation over recreancy and pollution. If some one arrested is proved innocent, it is to them a disappointment. They would rather believe evil than good. They are vultures, preferring carrion. They would like to be on a committee to find something wrong. They wish that as eye-glasses have been invented to improve the sight, and ear trumpets have been invented to help the hearing, a corresponding instrument might be invented for the nose, to bring nearer a malodor. Pessimism says of the Church, "The majority of the members are hypocrites, although it is no temporal advantage to be a member of the Church, and therefore there is no temptation to hypocrisy." Pessimism says that the influence of newspapers is only bad, and that they are corrupting the world; when the fact is that they are the mightiest agency for the arrest of crime, and the spread of intelligence, and the printing press, secular and religious, is setting the nations free. The whole tendency of things is toward cynicism, and the gospel of Smash-up. We excuse David of the text for a paroxysm of disgust, because he apologizes for it to all the centuries, but it is a deplorable fact that many have taken the attitude of perpetual distrust and anathematization. There are, we must admit, deplorable facts, and we would not hide or minify them. We are not much encouraged to find that the great work of official reform in New York City begins by a proposition to the liquor dealers to break the law by keeping their saloons open on Sunday from two in the afternoon to eleven at night. Never since America was discovered has there been a worse insult to sobriety, and decency, and religion than that proposition. That proposition is equal to saying: "Let law, and order, and religion have a chance on Sunday forenoons, but Sunday afternoons open all the gates to gin, and alcohol, and Schiedam schnapps, and sour mash, and Jersey lightning, and the variegated swill of breweries, and drunkenness, and crime. Consecrate the first half of the Sunday to God, and the last half to the devil. Let the children on their way to Sunday Schools in New York at three o'clock in the afternoon, meet the alcoholism that does more than all other causes combined to rob children of their fathers and mothers, and strew the land with helpless orphanage. Surely, strong drink can kill enough people and destroy enough families, and sufficiently crowd the alms-houses and penitentiaries in six days of the week, without giving it an extra half day for pauperism and assassination.

Although we are not very jubilant over a municipal reform that opens the exercises by a doxology to rum, we have full faith in God, and in the Gospel, which will yet sink all iniquity as the Atlantic ocean melts a flake of snow. What we want, and what I believe we will have, is a great religious awakening that will moralize and Christianize our great populations, and make them superior to temptations, whether unlawful or legalized. So I see no cause for disheartenment. Pessimism is a sin, and those who yield to it cripple themselves for the war, on one side of which are all the forces of darkness, led on by Apollyon, and on the other side of which are all the forces of light, led on by the Omnipotent. I risk the statement that the vast majority of people are doing the best they can. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand of the officials of the municipal and the United States governments are honest. Out of a thousand bank presidents and cashiers, nine hundred and ninety-nine are worthy the position they occupy. Out of a thousand merchants, mechanics and professional men, nine hundred and ninety-nine are doing their duty as they understand it. Out of one thousand engineers, and conductors, and switchmen, nine hundred and ninety-nine are true to their responsible positions. It is seldom that people arrive at positions of responsibility until they have been tested over and over again. If the theory of the pessimist were accurate, society would long ago have gone to pieces, and civilization would have been submerged with barbarism, and the wheel of the centuries would have turned back to the dark ages. A wrong impression is made that because two men falsify their bank accounts, those two wrong-doers are blazoned before the world, while nothing is said in praise of the hundreds of bank clerks who have stood at their desks year in and year out until their health is well-nigh gone, taking not a pin's worth of that which belongs to others for themselves, though with skillful stroke of pen they might have enriched themselves, and built their country-seats on the banks of the Hudson, or the Rhine. It is a mean thing in human nature that men and women are not praised for doing well, but only excoriated when they do wrong. By divine arrangement the most of the families of the earth are at peace, and the most of those united in marriage have for each other affinity and affection. They may have occasional differences, and here and there a season of pout, but the vast majority of those in the conjugal relation, chose the most appropriate companionship, and are happy in that relation. You hear nothing of the quietude and happiness of such homes, though nothing but death will them part. But one sound of marital discord makes the ears of a continent, and perhaps of a hemisphere, alert. The one letter that ought ought never to have been written, printed in a newspaper, makes more talk than the millions of letters that crowd the post-offices, and weigh down the mail-carriers, with expressions of honest love. Tolstoi, the great Russian author, is wrong when he prints a book for the depreciation of marriage. If your observation has put you in an attitude of deploration for the marriage state, one or two things is true in regard to you: you have either been unfortunate in your acquaintanceship, or you yourself are morally rotten. The world, not as rapid as we would like, but still with long strides, is on the way to the scenes of beatitude and felicity which the Bible depicts. The man who cannot see this is wrong, either in his heart, or liver, or spleen. Look at the great Bible picture gallery, where Isaiah has set up the pictures of aborescence, girdling the world with cedar, and fir, and pine, and boxwood, and the lion led by a child; and St. John's pictures of waters and trees, and white horse cavalry, and tears wiped away, and trumpets blown, and harps struck, and nations redeemed. While there are ten thousand things I do not like, I have not seen any discouragement for the cause of God for twenty-five years. The Kingdom is coming. The earth is preparing to put on bridal array. We need to be getting our anthems and grand marches ready. In our hymnology we shall have more use for Antioch than for Windham; for Ariel than for Naomi. Let "Hark! from the Tombs a doleful cry," be submerged with "Joy to the World, the Lord is Come!" Really, if I thought the human race were as determined to be bad, and getting worse, as the pessimists represent, I would think it was hardly worth saving. If after hundreds of years of Gospelization no improvement has been made, let us give it up and go at something else beside praying and preaching. My opinion is that if we had enough faith in quick results, and could go forth rightly equipped with the Gospel call, the battle for God and righteousness would end with this nineteenth century, and the twentieth century, only five or six years off, would begin the millennium, and Christ would reign, either in person on some throne set up between the Alleghanies and the Rockies, or in the Institutions of mercy and grandeur set up by his ransomed people. Discouraged work will meet with defeat. Expectant and buoyant work will gain the victory. Start out with the idea that all men are liars and scoundrels, and that everybody is as bad as he can be, and that society, and the Church, and the world are on the way to demolition, and the only use you will ever be to the world will be to increase the value of lots in a cemetery. We need a more cheerful front in all our religious work. People have enough trouble already, and do not want to ship another cargo of trouble in the shape of religiosity. If religion has been to you a peace, a defense, an inspiration, and a joy, say so. Say it by word of mouth; by pen in your right hand; by face illumined with a divine satisfaction. If this world is ever to be taken for God, it will not be by groans, but by hallelujahs. If we could present the Christian religion as it really is, in its true attractiveness, all the people would accept it, and accept it right away. The cities, the nations would cry out: "Give us that! Give it to us in all its holy magnetism and gracious power! Put that salve on our wounds! Throw back the shutters for that morning light! Knock off these chains with that silver hammer! Give us Christ—his pardon, his peace, his comfort, his heaven! Give us Christ in song; Christ in sermon; Christ in book; Christ in living example!"

As a system of didactics, religion has never gained one inch of progress. As a technicality, it befogs more than it irradiates. As a dogmatism, it is an awful failure. But as a fact, as a reinforcement, as a transfiguration, it is the mightiest thing that ever descended from the heavens, or touched the earth. Exemplify it in the life of a good man or a good woman, and no one can help but like it. A city missionary visited a house in London and found a sick and dying boy. There was an orange lying on his bed, and the missionary said, "Where did you get that orange?" He said, "A man brought it to me. He comes here often, and reads the Bible to me, and prays with me, and brings me nice things to eat." "What is his name?" said the city missionary. "I forget his name," said the sick boy, "but he makes great speeches over in that great building," pointing to the Parliament House of London. The missionary asked, "Was his name Mr. Gladstone?" "Oh, yes," said the boy, "that is his name; Mr. Gladstone." Do you tell me a man can see religion like that and not like it? There is an old-fashioned mother in a farm-house. Perhaps she is somewhere in the seventies; perhaps seventy-five or seventy-six. It is the early evening hour. Through spectacles No. 8 she is reading a newspaper until towards bed-time, when she takes up a well-worn Book, called the Bible. I know from the illumination in her face she is reading one of the thanksgiving Psalms, or in Revelation the story of the twelve pearly gates. After awhile she closes the book, and folds her hands, and thinks over the past, and seems whispering the names of her children, some of them on earth and some of them in heaven. Now a smile is on her face, and now a tear, and sometimes the smile catches the tear. The scenes of a long life come back to her. One minute she sees all the children smiling around her, with their toys, and sports, and strange questionings. Then she remembers several of them down sick with infantile disorders. Then she sees a short grave, but over it cut in marble: "Suffer them to come to Me." Then there is the wedding hour, and the neighbors in, and the promise of "I will," and the departure from the old homestead. Then a scene of hard times, and scant bread, and struggle. Then she thinks of a few years with gush of sunshine, and flittings of dark shadows, and vicissitudes. Then she kneels down slowly, for many years have stiffened the joints, and the illnesses of a lifetime have made her less supple. Her prayer is a mixture of thanks for sustaining grace during all those years; and thanks for children good, and Christian, and kind; and a prayer for the wandering boy, whom she hopes to see come home before her departure. And then her trembling lips speak of the land of reunion where she expects to meet her loved ones already translated; and after telling the Lord in very simple language how much she loves him, and trusts him, and hopes to see him soon, I hear her pronounce the quiet "Amen," and she rises up—a little more difficult effort than kneeling down. And then she puts her head on the pillow for the night, and the angels of safety and peace stand sentinel about the couch in the farm-house; and her face even and anon shows signs of dreams about the Heaven she read of before retiring. In the morning the day's work has begun down-stairs, and seated at the table the remark is made, "Mother must have overslept herself." And the grandchildren also notice that grandmother is absent from her usual place at the table. One of the grandchildren goes to the foot of the stairs and cries, "Grandmother!" But there is no answer. Fearing something is the matter they go up to see, and all seems right. The spectacles and Bible on the stand, and the covers of the bed are smooth, and the face calm, her white hair on the white pillow-case like snow on snow already fallen. But her soul is gone up to look upon the things that the night before she had been reading of in the Scriptures. What a transporting look on her dear old wrinkled face! She has seen the "King in His beauty." She has been welcomed by the "Lamb who was slain." And her two oldest sons having hurried up-stairs, look and whisper, Henry to George, "That is religion!" and George to Henry, "Yes, that is religion!"

There is a New York merchant who has been in business I should say forty or fifty years. During an old-fashioned revival of religion in boyhood he gave his heart to God. He did not make the ghastly, and infinite, and everlasting mistake of sowing "wild oats," with the expectation of sowing good wheat later on. He realized the fact that the most of those who sow "wild oats," never reap any other crop. He stayed right, and has kept right. He went down in 1857, when the banks failed, but he failed honestly, and never lost his faith in God. Ups and downs—he sometimes laughs over them—but whether losing or gaining, he was growing better all the time. He h been in many business ventures, but he never ventured the experiment of gaining the world and losing his soul. His name was a power both in the Church and in the business world. He has drawn more checks for contributions to asylums, and churches, and schools than any one, except God, knows. He has kept many a business man from failing by lending his name on the back of a note till the crisis was past. All heaven knows about him, for the poor woman whose rent he paid in her last days, and the man with consumption in the hospital to whom he sent flowers and the cordials just before ascension, and the people he encouraged in many ways, after they entered heaven kept talking about it; for the immortals are neither deaf nor dumb. Well, it is about time for the old merchant himself to quit earthly residence. As it is toward evening, he shuts the safe, puts the roll of newspapers in his pocket, thinking that the family may like to read them after he gets home. He folds up a five dollar bill and gives it to the boy to carry to one of the carmen who got his leg broken, and may be in need of a little money; puts a stamp on a letter to his grandson at college, a letter with good advice and an enclosure to make the holidays happy; then looks around the store or office and says to the clerks, "Good evening," and starts for home, stopping on the way at a door to ask how his old friend, a deacon in the same church, is getting on since his last bad attack of vertigo.

He enters his own home, and that is his last evening on earth. He does not say much. No last words are necessary. His whole life has been a testimony for God and Righteousness. More people would like to attend his obsequies than any house or church would hold. The officiating clergyman begins his remarks by quoting from the Psalmist: "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men." Every hour in heaven for all the million years of eternity that old merchant will see the results of his earthly beneficence and fidelity; while on the street where he did business, and in the orphan asylum in which he was a director, and in the church of which he was an officer, whenever his geniality, and beneficence, and goodness are referred to, bank director will say to bank director, and merchant to merchant, and neighbor to neighbor, and Christian to Christian, "That is religion. Yes, that is religion."

There is a man seated or standing very near you? Do not look at him for it might be unnecessary embarrassment. Only a few minutes ago he came down off the steps of as happy a home as there is in this or any other city Fifteen years ago, by reason of his dissipated habits his home was a horror to wife and children. What that woman went through with in order to preserve respectability and hide her husband's disgrace is a tragedy which it would require a Shakespeare, or Victor Hugo to write out in five tremendous acts. Shall I tell it? He struck her! Yes, the one whom at the altar he had taken with vows so solemn they made the orange blossoms tremble! He struck her! He made the beautiful holidays "a reign of terror." Instead of his supporting her, she supported him The children had often heard him speak the name of God, but never in prayer, only in profanity. It was the saddest thing on earth that I can think of — a destroyed home! Walking along the street one day an impersonation of all wretchedness, he saw a sign at the door of a Young Men's Christian Association: "Meeting for men only." He went in, hardly knowing why he did so, and sat down by the door, and a young man was in broken voice and poor grammar telling how the Lord had saved him from a dissipated life, and the man back by the door said to himself, why cannot I have the Lord do the same thing for me, and he put his hands all a-tremble over his bloated face, and said, "O God, I want that! I must have that!" and God said, "You shall have it, and you have it now!" And the man came out, and went home a changed man, and though the children at first shrunk back, and looked to the mother, and began to cry with fright, they soon saw that the father was a changed man. That home has turned from "Paradise Lost" to "Paradise Regained." The wife sings all day long at her work for she is so happy, and the children rush out into the hall at the first rattle of the father's key in the door-latch to welcome him with caresses, and questions of, "What have you brought me?" They have family prayers. They are altogether on the road to heaven, and when the journey of life is over they will live forever in each other's companionship. Two of their darling children are there already, waiting for father and mother to come up. What changed that man? What reconstructed that home? What took that wife who was a slave of fear and drudgery, and made her a queen on a throne of affection. I hear a whispering all through this assemblage. I know what you are saying: "That's religion! Yes, that's religion!" My Lord and my God, give us more of it!

Why, my hearers from all parts of the earth, do you not get this bright, and beautiful, and radiant, and blissful, and triumphant thing for yourselves, then go home telling all your neighbors on the Pacific, or in Nova Scotia, or in Louisiana, or Maine, or Brazil, or England, or Italy, or any part of the round world, that they may have it, too; have it for the asking; have it now? Mind you, I do not start from the pessimistic standpoint that David did, when he got mad and said in his haste, "All men are liars!" or from the creed of others that every man is as bad as he can be. I rather think from your looks that you are doing about as well as you can in the circumstances in which you are placed, but I want to invite you up into heights of safety, and satisfaction, and holiness, as much higher than those which the world affords as Everest, the highest mountain in all the earth, is higher than your front doorstep.

Here he comes now. Who is it? I might be alarmed and afraid if I had not seen him before and heard his voice. I thought he would come before I got through with this sermon. Stand back and make way for him. He comes with scars all around his forehead; scars in the centre of both hands stretched out to greet you; scars on the instep of both the feet with which he advances; scars on the breast under which throbs the great heart of sympathy which feels for you. I announce him. I introduce him to you: Jesus of Bethlehem, and Olivet and Golgotha. Why comest thou hither this winter day, thou of the springtime and summery heavens! He answers: To give all this audience pardon for guilt; condolence for grief; whole regiments of help for day of battle; and eternal life for the dead! What response shall I give him? In your behalf and in my own behalf I hail him with the ascription: "Unto him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."

THE LORD'S APPOINTMENT.

I SAY it over and over, and yet again to-day
It rests my heart as surely as it did yesterday,
It is the Lord's appointment,
Whatever my work may be.
I am sure in my heart of hearts
He has offered it to me.

I must say it over and over, and again to-day,
For my work is different from that of yesterday,
It is the Lord's appointment,
It quiets my restless will
Like the voice of tender mother,
And my heart and will are still.

I will say it over and over, this, and every day,
Whatsoever the Master orders, come what may,
It is the Lord's appointment,
For only His love can see
What is wisest, best and right,
What is truly good for me.

A FUNERAL IN AFRICA.

Dr. Robert H. Nassau Writes of an Incident in his Work as Physican and Missionary at Libreville.

IN a letter received a few days ago from Dr. Robert H. Nassau, the eminent missionary who has given so many years of labor and consecrated service to the cause of Christ in the Dark Continent, he thus describes a recent incident of his work:

The conditions at Libreville, where I am now stationed are very different from those at my former station. Physically, they are much easier, but not so satisfactory in evangelistic work. The population of this place is very heterogeneous. Civilization and many degrees of half civilization in transition, mixed up with pure heathen. A hard place to work in. Just these last few days I have had some illustrations of this in funeral and mourning customs. An old woman, Ozume, one of my church members, has been sick for some two years, off and on, with a dysenteric affection. She almost died of it about a year ago, when Mrs. Ogden worked over her a great deal and she got over that attack. A few months ago she had another attack. She lived with a married daughter just outside the line of the Mission premises and only a gunshot distant from this house. She walked slowly and painfully daily to me for her dose of medicine. It was impossible with my many engagements to go to her. I dare not send to the villages more than one dose at a time of any dangerous medicine, lest it should all be drunk at once, on the idea that if a little is good, more would be better. Anyone with her disease should keep prone on the back, so I told her not to come herself but to send someone. She said she had no one. I asked her where was her daughter? her sister? her son-in-law's slaves? the little children playing about her door? She said they would not come for her, or were otherwise occupied, that they said the mission could take care of her, she being a professing Christian. Even when she did come I had to provide the cup in which to send the medicine. And, finally, I had to send one of my own workmen to carry the cup daily, or thrice daily, as the case needed. She never entirely recovered: could only occasionally come to church, though her house is only a few hundred yards away from the church building, and she was nor able to be with us at the table on Sabbath, October 7, 1894. When, about ten A. M., of Monday October 8, a wail was raised, I suspected that it proceeded from her house, and that she was dead. The mourning customs here are exactly those of Oriental nations, as described in the Bible: ornaments laid aside, most (and sometimes all) clothing taken off, only old torn garments, hair disheveled, sitting on the ground, and extravagant wailing.

Immediately came the son-in-law, to ask for a spot in our cemetery. There are three cemeteries: the Roman Catholic, where, of course, only Romanists, white and native, are buried, our Protestant, for any civilized foreigner, white or black, the third, for heathen, etc., a neglected Potter's field. After assigning the spot to him and loaning him the implements, he sent men to dig, and I went to do any pastoral work, for which there might be call, at the house. At such times, one is not expected to salute or be saluted. There were no seats prepared, nor was any brought to me. I stood on the veranda of his neat bamboo cottage, by the door, opening into the sitting-room. (She had died in an old comfortless hut.) On the floor, in the middle of the room, was a comfortable mattress on which the corpse was lying, covered with a clean counterpane. (In life she had had barely enough for decency, and not enough for warmth.) According to custom, her head was tenderly pillowed on the thigh of the nearest female relative. Six of these were sitting by the corpse, frantically tearing their hair, tears coursing down their cheeks, shrieking, calling the dead by dear names, and imploring her to come back. Six other women were sitting or lying prone on the floor, quietly smoking their pipes and waiting their turn to take the mourners' places, when the voices or tears of the latter should be exhausted. I have never been able to overcome the depressing influence made on me by that mourning more than thirty years ago, though I have long since learned that it is all hollow. Some of our professing Christians engage in it, afraid not to "follow the fashion." (You know what that means, even in America.) Our better educated and ladylike women, of course, will dress decently, but on such occasions they always wear some old torn dark dress. Very few but what insist that it must be torn and soiled. Out of my sixty male and female members, probably not more than five would dare to wear a clean dress. They conform, so far, as to buy a few yards of some dark cotton stuff, and wear it over their ordinary dress. My little Mary's nurse and governess, Auzentyuma, is one of these few ladies; you perceive why I was willing to entrust her with the training of my child. I did not stay long; it did not seem the time to speak in that hubbub. Later on in the day, when the less civilized element had exhausted itself somewhat, I heard the voice of native Christian women singing hymns under the guidance of one of my elders.

Funerals here, like Irish wakes, are occasions for drunkenness. There are some of my members, who, totally abstinent on all other occasions, will drink at a funeral or at a marriage, through fear of being called unsocial, and at the funeral, for hunger. It is impossible for the relatives of the dead to feed the crowd that settles on them, perhaps for a whole week, or even a month; but it is easy to provide rum—costs less than proper food and allays the pangs of hunger. That very day, the heathen crowd began to be drunken; two men, distant relatives, came with the official Government burial-permit for eight A. M. of next day, but allowing me discretion for five P. M. of that very day. I was ready for either. These two insisted that it should be at five P. M.; they were so drunk, they could not walk straight. The son-in-law decided for eight A. M., of next day. One old woman, a church member came to me a day later, and surprised me by kneeling to me (as the Romanists, at confession; of course, I instantly bade her rise), to confess that she had been intoxicated. She said that she was hungry, and the little liquor she had taken, and to which she was not accustomed, had, on her empty stomach, gone promptly to her head.

As an offset to the noise in the village that Monday night, my usual young people's prayer meeting was well attended.

A NEW CHIEF.

The decision of a whole village to serve Christ is reported as having recently occurred. The story is told by Rev. Oscar Michelsen, the author of "Cannibals Won for Christ." He says: "The village of Selembanga, on the east side of Tonga, New Hebrides, has just changed its chieftain. This is the village of which Manambalea was chief, but according to usage, the chieftainship was passed over to a young man named Usamoli, whilst Manambalea was still strong and active. All the time I have been on the island, Usamoli has been a drag on our work. During my absence the Christian life of Selembanga has been ripening very much, whilst Usamoli has not been able fully to tear himself away from his harem. As the chiefs rule more by example than by direct orders to the people, it is easy to see that such conduct would have a very bad effect. For months and years there has been a great deal of talk about his conduct, until about a fortnight ago the people felt they could bear it no longer. At last Manambalea ordered the big drum to be sounded, which is the call for the whole village to assemble. He stood up and rehearsed how that many years ago he resigned the chieftainship according to the wishes of the people, in order to make Usamoli chief. He continued, 'You followed him for a long time; but now another chief has come in, and many of us follow him. I have called you together to-day to ask who is on the Lord's side—who will have Jesus for Chief, and who will have Usamoli?' All declared for Jesus. Usamoli was then sent for, and Manambalea informed him that he was no longer chief, and that the whole village had chosen Jesus to be their Chief. Manambalea then talked to the young man in a most kindly manner, expressing the hope that he, too, would soon place himself under Jesus, the divine Chief. Since then everything has gone on quietly in the village."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

CHRIST AND THE CHILDREN.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 10. Matt. 18: 1-14. Golden Text Matt. 13: 14. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE beauty of the child is his lack of self-consciousness; he may be a beautiful child, but he does not know it, he may be ugly, but it does not trouble him; he may be gifted, but he is innocent of his superiority. As soon as a child becomes self-conscious, and begins to pride himself on his superiority to his little brother or sister, or to draw selfish comparisons between himself and some child companion, one has a sickening proof of the fall, and of how, even in little children, human nature is manifestly a ruin. The true child spirit in the unconsciousness of self, continued untainted in Jesus, the Son of man, throughout his life on earth.

On descending the mountain where he had been transfigured, Jesus had healed the epileptic, whose father had brought him in vain to the nine apostles who had remained below, in the plain. They had asked of him privately, "Why could not we cast it out? And he saith unto them, Because of your little faith." (Matt. 17: 20, R. V.) "Bnt while all were marvelling at all the things which he did, he said unto his disciples, Let these words sink into your ears: for the Son of man will be delivered up into the hands of men. But they understood not the saying, and it was concealed from them that they should not perceive it: and they were afraid to ask him about his saying." Unable to cast out devils, although Jesus had given them authority to cast out; incapable of understanding the blessed truth which Jesus taught them, and above all, afraid to ask him! What could all this mean?

There was Something Wrong, and Jesus, who knew their hearts, waited for his opportunity. "They came to Capernaum; and when he was in the house he asked them, What were ye reasoning in the way? But they held their peace: for they had disputed one with another in the way, who was the greatest." It was at the very same hour in which Jesus had rescued Peter from his dilemma about the tribute money, and had directed him to go and "cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up," in the mouth of which he should find a piece of money, and he had directed "that take, and give unto them for me and thee." Knowing all that was going on, he did not disassociate himself from his erring disciples, from the Peter who had so often stumbled; it was still "for me and thee;" nothing cooled his love, nothing exhausted his patience. But he must teach and they must learn; and the lessons he taught should be laid up for the time when the Holy Ghost should bring them to remembrance, and when they would at last sink down into their ears. They could never come to a satisfactory conclusion; He must solve the question which commenced in their reasoning together. Now that he had detected them in their unseemly strife, they brought the question to him: "Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?"

Is not this qestion or a similar one, that which is sowing discord thoughout the whole church of God? Is it not the canker-worm at the root of mission work in our home lands, and precious missionary work among the heathen? Is not the sense of superiority to others in the knowledge of the language, the facility of expression, the talent for organization,—even, yes, and frequently, the success in winning souls, used by the great enemy to foster a self-consciousness in some, which in some measure despises, or at least disparages others? And is not this the lesson of the Cross from sinking down into the ears of those, whose conscious superiority makes them think they know, and do not need to learn? Is not this the hindrance to the casting out of devils? How can one who yields to the devil's temptations to exalt himself, cast out the devil in another? Is not this the secret of a fear to bring things to a point with Jesus lest the inquirer must needs come down from his high pedestal, and find himself on a level with, or lower still than those whom he had looked down upon as inferiors?

Jesus "called to him a little child." There was no resistance in this little unconscious one; no fear of Jesus, because there was no self-consciousness in him. Jesus "set him in the midst,"—the beautiful picture of a true inheritor of the kindom of heaven—and said, "Except ye turn (or be converted), and become as little children ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven." It is the hardest thing for human nature to become little, to recognize itself as of little worth. How much more to learn the truth that it is nothing worth. Yet this lesson is at the root of all the true kingliness of the kingdom of heaven.

How utterly the reverse of human nature which stands upon its own dignity, and exacts from others esteem and respect on account of the mere accident of birth, riches, etc. One expects to find this spirit among the heathen, whose whole religion consists in trying to be superior! but for Christians, whose only standing-ground before God is their identification with Jesus,—this same Jesus, who came down to the lowest place possible for human nature—how utterly unseemly, how utterly antagonistic to their faith and to him in whom they trust, to any thought of superiority over others! Is it not piteous that Christians, even Christians who have, as far as they understand, consecrated themselves to Christ, should "learn the way of the heathen" (Jer. 10: 2), in assuming or seeking to maintain, the chief place? Christ's kingship was manifested in his absence of self-assertion, while all he was, and all he did, bore witness of him. And in his teaching of his disciples, he led them in the very path which he himself trod. "Whoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." There is a self-conscious humility, but, like Saul's armour, it cannot fit the wearer. True humility is like that of the child, unconscious. But how shall we, who are by nature so self-conscious, ever accomplish the practice of a humility which is unconscious of itself? There is only one way, but that is the Way. Himself is the cure for ourselves. Self-contemplation always leads to pride, although it may put on the garb of humility, but contemplating Jesus and taking the place he gives us at the Cross—if he died for all," all were crucified with Christ: this leads to the real humility which loses sight of self in him. As "crucified with Christ" we can glory in the Cross, and in him who died there, but it is utterly impossible to glory in our being crucified with Christ; our sins, our shame brought him to the Cross. And if we truly take our place there with him, there is enough of shame to make us hide away from ourselves and from others, as well as from God, to be out of sight of any one but as hidden in him. How than shall we value ourselves, glory in ourselves, or institute comparisons between others and ourselves? How shall we disparage even the most unsatisfactory Christian, how shall we despise one of these little ones?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ONE of the most significant features in the character of Jesus, as portrayed in the Gospels, is his fondness for children. He liked to have them around him, would take them in his arms and sternly rebuked his disciples for keeping them away from him. There must have been something very lovable in his mere human character to have attracted them to him and he saw in them characteristics that caused him to love them. In this lesson, he makes one of them the text of sublime teaching. The disciples wanted to know who would be greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven. They had been disputing about it on the journey to Capernaum from Mount Hermon, where the Transfiguration had just taken place. It was not an abstract question with them, but a practical personal one. They were expecting their Master to set up a kingdom in Jerusalem and to reign over it with a magnificence surpassing that of Solomon. They saw themselves in imagination in high office under him, holding sway over their countrymen. So they ask him who would be greatest. To Jesus, oppressed with the revelation of his approaching suffering and death, their question must have seemed very crude. How little they understood the kingdom he was to establish! A kingdom, truly, but one composed of people redeemed from sin, who were seeking after righteousness. They would be men of every race and every clime, who were trying to live pure and beneficent lives and who should call him their king, because in him they found the strength and help necessary to the attainment of that object. His subjects would be men whom he would save by his death, that they might live in his service. Who should be greatest in that kingdom? He would tell them and more than that he would tell them. Calling a little child, he set him among them; Mark says, he took him in his arms. Except they became as little children, gentle, guileless, confiding, teachable, submissive, they should not even enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. Their first step must be like that of the child, to come to him when he called. Then he goes on to speak of their future, still retaining the figure of the child as a symbol. They were to receive, that is encourage, the beginner in the new life. Woe be to any one who offended him, that is caused him to stumble or be discouraged. And for him, henceforth, the growth in the Christ life must be his supreme desire. Everything must be sacrificed to that, just as we unhesitatingly amputate a foot or a hand to save life. A habit, an affection, a pursuit, though inexpressibly dear, must be given up, if it hinders progress. So might men enter the Kingdom.

"THEY BROUGHT YOUNG CHILDREN TO HIM."

Greatest in the kingdom. A king cannot make a man great. He may put a man into a great office and give him a great title, but he cannot make him great. The greatness must be in the man. Grosteste, a powerful and famous bishop, had an idle and stupid brother, who came to him with the request that Grosteste would make a great man of him. "Brother," replied the Bishop, "if your plough is broken, I'll pay for the mending of it, or if your ox should die, I'll buy you another; but I cannot make a great man of you. A plowman I found you and a plowman I must leave you."

Ye shall not enter. The story is told of a privilege being missed by a difficulty about an entrance. A concert, flower-show and general entertainment was being held in a private park. The owner of the park invited his personal friends, and afterwards determined to admit the general public. His friends were invited to his house, which opened upon the park; the public notice stated that at the gate opening from the highway into the park anyone would be admitted. One man in the village wishing to attend and seeing several persons enter the house, presented himself at the door. Had he a special invitation? he was asked. He said he had not. "Then," said the servant brusquely, "I cannot admit you." The man went away offended and the next day, when asked if he had been at the party, said he had not, for he had been refused admission. "Ah," said his friend when the circumstances were related, "you went to the wrong door. If you had gone to the public entrance you would have got in easily." Mr. Spurgeon told the story to a man who came to him complaining that for years he had been seeking salvation but had not found Christ. He was a good moral man, and had been familiar with the Gospel from childhood. "There is something wrong with your seeking," Mr. Spurgeon said. Telling him the story of the lawn-party, he added, "Now, you see if you can get in at the sinners' door." The man went away and prayed, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and in a few days returned saying that he had found peace.

Their angels. Frequent references are made in the Bible to the ministry of angels. Christ refers to these mysterious beings here by way of reproof to any of his followers who might be disposed to despise a child or a new convert. No such contempt, he intimates, is felt by the angels, although they stand in the presence of God. The passage is sometimes used to show that there is a special angel appointed to have charge of each Christian, but it does not afford sufficient basis for such a theory. In monarchical lands the privilege of access to the monarch is highly prized. It is reserved for nobles and persons holding high office. But the woman who is nursing the monarch's infant, frequently sees and speaks with the king. In a European picture gallery is a famous painting of a feast in which the guests are in rags and tatters. Servants are running about briskly. Some are bringing in beautiful clothing, others are cooking viands, others are bringing in delicacies, all for the delectation of the ragged guests. When the spectator comes near the picture, he sees the servants are angels.

RELIEF WORK GOES ON BRAVELY.

Train-loads of Coal, Clothing and Supplies for the Sufferers—Our Corps of Distributors Busy in both States and Reporting Progress—A Season of Royal Benevolence.

IN no work of far-reaching benevolence, among the many they have conducted in former years, have the readers of this journal displayed such an amount of energy and enthusiasm as in the great charity upon which they are now engaged. They have already established for themselves a character for practical benevolence such as attaches to no other aggregation of Christian men and women in this Union—and all the more deservedly that their efforts have been directed by no desire of vain-glory or personal reward, but from a Christ-like spirit of sympathy with human suffering. And that a double portion of blessing has already attended their efforts and their prayers is demonstrated by the news that reaches us from several points in the afflicted West, of a spiritual awakening, full of precious promise.

Although every week brings nearer the prospect of permanent relief to the sufferers in the drouth-stricken districts of Nebraska and Kansas, through legislative measures, the condition so far is only mitigated in the degree that it has been helped through already impoverished local sources, and by the generosity of the East and South. Great cargoes of food, supplies and fuel are going forward from various points, and communities are striving to outdo each other in the abundance of their gifts.

It is estimated that ten per cent. of the entire Nebraska farming population need assistance from outside sources, the greatest destitution being in the southwest part of the State. Part of Western Kansas is in a similar condition. Much substantial help, in the shape of money and clothing, has already been rendered, and at several points the distress has been perceptibly alleviated. This is specially true of Kansas, where the suffering has been much less extensive than in Nebraska, being practically confined to a few counties. Up to the present time it cannot be truthfully said that there is any general diminution of the distress in Nebraska; indeed, every mail brings additional correspondence that reveals new centres of destitution.

Cargoes of Coal and Food.

What our corps of Volunteer Distributors are doing may be gathered from the letters published below. Contributions in money are coming in generously, to the Relief Fund and large shipments of clothing and supplies are made regularly from our Central Relief Station, in New York. Meanwhile, hundreds of gifts of money, clothing, etc., have been sent direct to the Distributors for allotment in their districts.

Some of the gifts are of a character and value that demonstrate the splendid generosity of the givers. The coal operators of Fairmont, W. Va., notify us, through Mr. Oliver J. Sands, that they have contributed an entire train-load of coal, which will go to Lincoln, Neb. At Cobleskill, N.Y., Mr. D. L. Rose writes us, the church people and Societies have contributed a car-load of clothing and provisions. Mr. John H. Eby, of Leaman Place, Pa., notifies us that the good people of Strasburg, Ronko, Kinzy, Buyerstown, and Leaman Place have loaded a car with flour, clothing and provisions for the sufferers, and Mr. Amos Milles, of Quarryville, Pa. writes that he has a car-load of potatoes ready to load whenever the weather will permit them to be sent forward without danger of freezing. These are only a few of the many large contributions from readers of this journal and their friends, that are either on the way or in preparation to be sent to the sufferers.

The benevolent people of Forest City, Ill., have loaded a car with corn, flour, groceries and clothing for the destitute of Hazard, Neb., and the citizens of Rantoul, Ill., are preparing one or two cars of provisions, grain, and clothing, which will be sent to Mr. Ludden, at Lincoln, for distribution. Mrs. Lucretia M. Graton, Worcester, Mass., sent five barrels of clothing (estimated value $150) and $40 in in money to the sufferers. W. Atlee, Burpee & Co., the well-known seedsmen of Philadelphia, have donated $100 worth of seeds, in good assortments for distribution in the districts where crop failures have been reported.

A Suggestion to Contributors.

All money contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office direct, and not indiscriminately to the West. The reason for this course is obvious: it is necessary to distribute intelligently where most needed, if it is desired to accomplish the greatest amount of good, and this can only be done by keeping the work of distribution within a system where accurate information as to the condition and needs of the section to be relieved is at hand to guide the operations. The very object of the relief movement is defeated if a few beneficiaries are helped beyond their real needs, while many others are comparatively neglected. Besides, one dollar, when it is used in a wholesale purchase of flour and provision, such as can be made at Lincoln, goes as far as three dollars spent in small retail purchases. Our earlier money remittances through local distributors were to relieve wants quickly; the object now should be to make the Relief Fund a means of assistance to every destitute family that can be reached, and this can only be done by concentration of its resources in the line of large purchases of supplies.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, who is now in Nebraska, advises that, whenever possible, contributions of clothing and other articles should be sent to Rev. L. P. Ludden, State Relief Committee, Lincoln direct, instead of via New York. The Nebraska railroads are giving free transportation to all such contributions to any part of the State. He adds that while the suffering was in no wise exaggerated, yet through the generous contributions already made it has been considerably relieved and hundreds of families lately destitute now look forward hopefully to the coming Spring, and the prospect of a harvest next season.

What Some of Our Distributors Say.

Among a corps of over three hundred distributors, working over so extensive a territory, it is to be expected that there would be a great variety of experiences. All write with enthusiasm of the work, and state what has been accomplished with the funds entrusted to them. Letters reporting progress in the work have been received from these Distributors: Mrs. Dr. Huss, Kearney; Rebecca Burgess, Red Cloud; M. L. Bundy, Wallace; Mrs. L. A. Prindle, Stratton, (who acknowledges receipt of $3.50 from an unknown donor); Thomas Johnson, Haigler; Maria E. Thornton, Loup City; Mrs. J. F. Russell, Fanelon; Mrs. A. Warner, Republican City, (who has received $15 and four packages of clothing from other sources); Mrs. Ira McCollister, Berwyn, (many other donations received); Mrs. S. E. Crane, Editor, "The Courier," Arcadia; Mrs. Eda Leucks, Inman; Blanche Cluster, Pleasanton, and others in Nebraska, also Rev. David D. Dodge, Almena, Kan., Geo. L. Copeland, Nonchalanta, Kan., and many others in the same state. Mrs. O. P. Starkey, of Palmer, Neb., says:

We found one family of five children barefooted and poorly clothed . . . They pleaded for shoes, but we told them that bread was more essential. I gave an order for one hundred pounds of flour and to-day we have been culling our own garments and those of our neighbors till we will have them passable. You have no idea what the destitution is here among the farmers.

T. H. Henderson, of the firm of Pearson and Henderson, merchants, Elsie, Neb., writes:

I have distributed the whole amount to the best of my ability, buying the goods and thus saving something by so doing. The necessities of the people are so great that they cannot be told. There is much suffering and unless aid is given through the winter season deaths from cold and starvation will be the result. I have receipts for everything. Our prayers ascend daily with yours.

From Spencer, Boyd Co., Neb., Mrs. F. K. Erwin, writes:

The County Committee cannot get enough to supply the wants of one-tenth of the most needy. What is needed is something to eat, and to wear, and bedding.

Orphaned and Destitute.

Alice Fletcher, Arcadia, Neb., in a letter to a relative about the distress, gives these pathetic incidents:

We are not among the ones that are suffering; we are living on what we have saved. People are almost starving to death. To see them, you would not believe that they could live. There has been some aid sent in here, but they need more. One of our neighbors died Dec. 9, and did not even have a shirt to be laid out in. I gave them one. It did seem awful. Two weeks ago a mother died and left a baby four days' old, and five other children. They had no milk for the little one, so the father gave it flour and water. A kind lady has taken the baby, and the rest are scatt red around. We are the only ones in our neighborhood that have not suffered. We have given what we could. You may think what it is for little ones to live on flour and water mixed up and eaten raw, but to see it is far different.

"I never wish to see so much suffering," writes E. A. Kirkpatrick, of Superior, Neb. "We have thirty families now to care for besides others out in the country and can hardly realize where it is to come from."

Mrs. L. A. Prindle, Stratton, Neb., gives this record of her work:

I have distributed the money among three poor families for flour, potatoes, and shoes—the shoes being for children. There are many other families in similar circumstances. I have never known the people here so poorly clad and fed as they are now.

All outside donations for the destitute in and around Merna, Neb., should hereafter be sent to Mrs. Willson, who has become President of the Relief Society.

A Pastor's 25-mile Ride.

Rev. J. E. Hawley, of Arcadia, took a trip of over twenty-five miles in the country among the neediest of the suffering farmers to make his distribution. Four poor families were relieved.

From J. E. Hathorn, M. D., of Bartley, Neb., we have this interesting letter:

The friends of the needy have responded nobly in the way of clothing, and what we have received and have been notified is on the way, and what will be sent before this is in print, will place the people in this locality in a very good condition in the line of clothing. If our friends could see how eager and thankfully fathers and mothers take even the very much worn clothing, and hear their remarks as to what they can do with this or that piece, it would make you feel amply paid for your trouble and expense. What we need now is food, fuel, and feed for stock.

This from Mrs J. L. Stroup tells its own story in brief:

There were fifty families sent in for aid a few days ago, and there are a great many others in need.

Rev. W. C. Miller, Beaver City, Neb., has received, since our appeal was published, from a Trenton, N. J., lady $1; Mrs. P. S. Russ, Worcester, $1; Mrs. S. L. Welbury, Newark, Ohio, $5; and boxes of clothing from Mrs. N. G. Norton, Vergennes, Vt., and Rev. S. A Glasgow, Woodson, Ill. Food and fuel, he writes, are still the greatest necessities. Shoes, garden seeds, and feed are also needed greatly.

The Cry for Bread Continuous.

Another of our distributors, Rev. R. A. Day, of the Friends' Church, Pearl, Neb., writes:

The response to the appeal made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been prompt and generous in bringing clothing and money to the sufferers in this section of Nebraska, as you will see by enclosed bill of receipts. I have distributed the larger part of the second-hand clothing and seventy-eight suits of ladies' underwear. Have bought twenty-five hundred pounds, or fifty sacks, of flour at $1.25 per hundred, and in a few cases have supplied other necessities. The most pressing need, and one that must be met, is the cry for bread, and this call is continuous. The demand for old clothing will be, I think, pretty fully met in this vicinity. Some of this clothing has gone into Perkins, some in Dundy, but of course most of it in this (Chase) county. This is also true of the flour supplied.

I would not have you infer that everyone here, or even a majority of the farmers, are in need of aid. Those who have stock, in any numbers, will be able to pull though all right. It is those who have relied upon raising grain for a living that are in the sorest straits, and the situation is bad enough without painting. May the gracious Master bless all the workers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and make his face to shine upon them, and those whose have been stirred by the appeal in behalf of suffering humanity here and elsewhere.

Hopes of Legislative Relief.

George W. Ryan, Ogalalla, Neb., writes of his work:

The contribution sent me for the needy has been dispensed to those most in need, as follows: a mother with eight children; had a little flour in the bottom of a fifty-pound sack, enough to make one baking. I left $2.50 worth of groceries. My second donation was to a family of seven children. Extreme poverty and destitution were manifest on every hand. Groceries to the amount of $2.60 were left here. While there doubtless will be much privation, and in many ways want, by families in some localities in Keith Co., yet I do not anticipate extreme suffering or starvation, as has already been the case in other portions of Neb. The Legislature now in session will doubtless take measures to lend impoverished counties money by issuing bonds to help the starving. But while buncomb, tardiness and red tape are tarrying by the way "on the other side," many of God's poor may suffer hunger and death. Meantime we crave help. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its work of alleviating the distress of the needy.

Mr. Geo. H. Hornby, lumber and hardware dealer, Valentine, Neb., another distributor, writes:

I have bought with the check forty-five yards of cotton flannel and one quilt, and two pounds coffee, and gave them to Mrs. A. Ludwig, President of the Woman's Relief Corps, and Mrs. Northrop, President of the W. C. T. U., to be given out with supplies that they are distributing. These societies have rooms in my store, where they receive and distribute supplies. Several cases of clothing and provisions have arrived, but so far the supply has not been equal to the demand.

From Mrs. W. D. Giffin, of the Ladies' Board of Relief, Gothenburg, Neb., comes this significant statement, after telling of her relief work as Distributor:

Our station agent, who is not a Christian, tells me that ninety per cent. of all donations coming to this place are coming through Christian denominations.

Another Pastor's Good Work.

An idea of the destitution in some parts of Nebraska may be gathered from letters of which the following from Rev. J. W. Thomas, Maywood, Neb., is an example:

I have six preaching appointments and make the round of my circuit once every two weeks, traveling by horse and cart, and of course I see much of the destitution of the people. Wherever I go, I am besieged by appeals for aid, not by members of my own church only, but from other churches and also those who are members of no church. At one place on my circuit, I am told that the farmers have had but one good crop in the past five years, owing to hail as well as drought. There are a few men interested in the sale of real estate, who object to the actual condition of this country being made known to the people of the Eastern States; and while I have no desire to say anything to lessen or hinder the financial prosperity of anyone engaged in legitimate business, I feel that is my duty to state facts plainly to those inquirers who are able and willing to contribute supplies for this drought-stricken and destitute country. Starvation is avoided by people who have food dividing it with their neighbors, by appealing to friends in the East for aid, and by securing some help from the county commissioners, which however, is very little now, as the counties are being thrown into debt so deeply. Most of the aid sent out so far has been clothing, but the most pressing demand now is for food.

With the remittance sent to him from the Fund Mr. Thomas helped no less than six families, living long distances apart in the country.

The People's Spirit Broken.

Another very interesting report of progress in the work is from Jane L. Goff, President of the W. C. T. U., of Hazard, Neb., who writes:

To date, I have received and distributed nine boxes and barrels, and one sack of clothing, one bushel of beans, two half barrels oatmeal, and thirty-two lbs. of rice. This has been divided among seventeen families; giving to each member such garments as were needed, and would fit. Cash received (which has not been very much) will be held for men and teams in the spring and early summer. Sherman County was not put on the list of needy counties, so all of the State relief goes by. I am struck very forcibly with the expression of the faces of those who receive aid. In the early days of Nebraska, fifteen years ago, I kept a country store in this township. These some people came to me with their trade. Their eyes were bright, and faces buoyant with hope and expectation. To-day, there is a heavy discouraged look in each face. Except in a few cases of extreme need, we have done nothing outside our boundaries, for we have hardly made a beginning in our own precincts. In the way of seeds, Burpee and Landreth have each sent a collection of garden seeds. I wish to add extra thanks, for the cleanliness of garments sent us. One could tell at a glance that our boxes had been packed by women.

Postmaster M. C. Warrington, of Mason City, Neb. (Editor "The Transcript"), writes:

Check for $25.00 for distribution among the destitute of this locality, has been received. I give my personal assurance that it will be placed where it will do much good. Your noble work for the poor people of Nebraska is more than commendable, and I am satisfied your plan of distribution is one which will come as near reaching those deserving and needing help as any that has been adapted.

Manager Ludden's Relief Work.

An idea of the method of State relief adopted in Nebraska is afforded in a letter from Rev. L. P. Ludden, Manager of the State Relief Commission, at Lincoln, Neb.:

Your check of $25 will be used for the procuring of food, supplies or fuel, in the next few days. We are truly grateful for the appeals that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has made in behalf of our drought-stricken people.

We have a complete organization for the distribution of supplies in every county in the destitute district. The counties are organized as follows: A Central Committee for relief consisting of seven or nine is formed by the citizens of the county gathered in a mass-meeting, and a sub-committee of three is elected by every voting precinct or school district, this is what we call our Visiting Committee, they are expected to visit every family in their respective districts and make a report in writing to the Central Committee. Upon a written recommendation signed by two of the three, the Central Committee are ready to issue supplies to the needy. All cash contributions come through the hands of the Commission, because we are able to make $1 go farther than $5 sent direct to individuals

Mrs. Lucy J. Barger of Hebron, Neb., writes that Thayer County is taking care of its own poor. Hebron has sent more than a car-load of food and clothing for the destitute in the western counties.

Cash contributions during the week are acknowledged on the next page, and gifts of clothing, &c., on page 78 of this issue.

Contributions to the Western Relief Fund.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

FRANCE'S NEW PRESIDENT.

AFTER a brief term of less than seven months, M. Casimir-Perier has given France and all Europe a genuine surprise by resigning his office as President of the French Republic. The reasons he assigned for so extraordinary a step seem ridiculously inadequate. He complained that he had been personally assailed in the press, that his friends had not defended him with the earnestness and sincerity he had a right to expect, and added that certain recent votes in the Legislature indicated a disposition to attack the parliamentary regime and the public liberty. As his chief duty in the office to which he was elected was to protect free institutions and public liberty, his resignation is regarded as an evidence of his lack of sense and courage. As the French Constitution has not the provision that we have in the Vice-Presidency, for filling an unexpired term, a new election was necessary. The Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, who in France elect the President, assembled accordingly on Jan. 17, in joint session and elected a President for the full term of seven years. Their choice fell on M. Francois Felix Faure who was secretary of the navy in the late government. He is a ship owner of Havre and is said to have the confidence of the commercial classes. In the Legislature he has always been recognized as an authority on marine and colonial matters. He is fifty-four years of age, tall and upright of carriage and a man of genial temperament. It is worthy of note that he is a Protestant, the first Protestant who has ever ruled over France. What his election may mean for the nation it is impossible to predict with any confidence. Belonging to the same political party as his predecessor, M. Faure will have to meet the same kind of opposition from the same enemies and will have the same difficulties to encounter. Like Casimir-Perier, too, he cannot count on all the men who voted for him as President. Many of them are opposed to him in politics, but gave him their votes because they preferred him to his chief rival, M. Brisson, who was the candidate of the Radicals. That they will give him their support in the Legislature is improbable and so the wheels of government may be blocked. Nor can M. Faure hope to gain any benefit by dissolving the Chamber. The socialists and anarchists have made capital out of the recent financial scandals, which have implicated many prominent men, and a feeling of disgust has been aroused against the crowd of adventurers who are preying on the public treasury, which is now becoming so fierce as to threaten social revolution. In the present state of public opinion an election would undoubtedly result in a more radical and revolutionary Chamber than the present one. France is now learning that the godlessness and infidelity which have characterized the nation for more than a century have led to a double danger to national life. They have produced a lack of principle in the upper classes and a ferocity and recklessness in the lower classes which are the usual precursors of civil conflict and bloodshed. (Isa. 1 : 23-25.)

A Captain's Complaint.

The captain of a schooner wrecked recently at Ocracoke, N. C., complains that one life was lost and his own and others imperilled by the lack of proper organization of the life-saving service. His ship, which was bound from Boston to Darien, Ga., was struck by a hurricane off the North Carolina coast, and was driven on a sand-bank. As it was in a sinking condition, the only boat on the ship was launched and the mate and several of the crew went in it to the land, to secure assistance for the captain and the remainder of the crew who remained on the ship. The boat was capsized in the breakers, but the men were all good swimmers and succeeded in getting ashore. There was no life-saving station at that point, but word was sent to the station at New Portsmouth, four miles to the south. There was, however, no organized crew there at the time, and a messenger was sent to Hatteras Inlet, twelve miles to the north. The crew there obeyed the summons, but by the time they had their apparatus at the scene of the disaster, darkness had come on, and nothing could be done. At dawn the crew succeeded in shooting a line to the wreck, but by that time one of the men had frozen to death, and the captain and the other seamen had suffered terribly from exposure. All the survivors were saved, but the captain complains bitterly of the delay consequent on the lack of organization. It may be hoped that in the day of final account no charge of a like character will be brought against any church. Magnificent buildings, fine choral services, and large contributions will count as nothing if the church has failed as a soul-saving institution. (I. Cor. 9: 22.)

M. F. FELIX FAURE, THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Insurrection in Hawaii.

A belated mail from Hawaii brings the news of an outbreak in Hawaii, on Jan. 6. About five hundred Kanakas and half-whites managed to secure arms, and under two leaders named Wilcox and Nowlein, attempted to surprise Honolulu. The government, however, had been informed that goods were being carried ashore from a steamer off Diamond Head, about six miles from the capital. The police were sent to investigate, and found that the goods were arms and ammunition. The Citizens' Guard and the Volunteer Companies were at once called out and arrangements made for the defence of the town. A squad of mounted police was dispatched to Diamond Head to ascertain the extent of the rising and a few citizens accompanied it. They lined up before the house of a suspected man and informed him that they had a warrant to search his house for arms. They were immediately fired upon from the windows of the house and from a canoe-shed on the beach. A rush was made to capture the canoe-shed, but a second volley was fired, and a young lawyer who was in the police party was killed, and a lieutenant of police dangerously wounded. The insurgents, finding that their plan of surprising Honolulu could not then be carried out, retreated to the bush. In the morning it was found that the insurgents had possession of the roads leading to Honolulu, and were well armed. One of the parties had a field gun. Their number did not exceed five hundred, while the Government's force including citizens who had volunteered, numbered twelve hundred. At several points there was a stubborn fight, but when the mail left the insurgents had everywhere been put to flight. Many had been killed and several taken prisoners. From the latter, information was obtained which shows that the intention was to surprise Honolulu on Sunday night while many citizens would be at church. The timely discovery at Diamond Head disarranged the plan and doubtless prevented much damage being done. The people in Honolulu have reason to be thankful for the vigilance of their government, It is much to be wished that a like vigilance were maintained by every Christian against the assaults of the great enemy of souls. His successes are frequently gained by sudden and unexpected temptations when there are no means at hand of resisting him. (I. Peter 5 : 8.)

A Court Surprised.

In the course of a discussion on the merits of a new judge of the Court of Appeals of New York, an early associate of the judge related an interesting experience of his court. He said that the judge, while serving as a County Judge in Erie county, became proficient in dealing with criminal cases. He was elected to the Supreme Court and when he took his seat there, he knew no more about the law administered in the court than he had picked up in the course of his studies as a youth. At his first term, he was called upon to decide a case of ejectment, involving the title to land. After listening to the arguments on both sides, the judge adjourned court for the day, to the surprise of all the lawyers present, as it was early in the afternoon. Another case was an action against an insurance company and in this case, too, the judge adjourned court early in the day. In both cases the decision he gave when the court re-opened was the subject of appeal, but the higher courts sustained it. The judge frankly admitted to his friend that his reason for adjournment was that he did not know what was the law in the case and wanted time to look it up. He worked over each case far into the night and when he had finished, was absolutely certain that his decision was impregnable. He followed this practice until he became one of the strongest judges in the district. The judge's example may be commended to Christian people who are puzzled by conflicting teaching. Fewer people would be led astray by heretical preachers, if the practice was more common of appealing at once to "to the law and to the testimony." (Isa. 8 : 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Religious Services Conducted by Rev. Dr. Talmage at the Academy of Music, New York, on Sunday afternoons, have already become a prominent feature of the metropolitan Sabbath. Vast crowds are in attendance long before the opening hour—3.30 o'clock—and it is impossible to accommodate more than half of the thousands that seek admission. The fifteen minutes preceding the sermon are devoted to sacred music, the great audience being led by the cornet and the piano. Some beautiful solos are rendered by Mr. Jacobs, the famous Gospel singer who has long been associated with Evangelist Moody.

Dr. A. T. Pierson is Preaching every Evening this week in Lafayette Ave. Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, of which Dr. Gregg is pastor.

The Dowager Empress of China has Written an autograph letter of thanks to the foreign ladies of Pekin who on her sixtieth birthday presented her with a beautifully bound copy of the New Testament.

A Deed of Conveyance of Property Made in 1817, but never registered, was filed last week in New York. It recorded the sale of meadow land now occupied by six city blocks. The price paid was five hundred and six dollars. It is now valued at nearly five millions.

The Hebrew-Christian Mission at 17 St. Mark's Place, New York, is now under the charge of Rev. Bernhard Angel, whose successful work among the Jews in Chicago has been notable. Mr. Angel also preaches on Saturdays in the De Witt Memorial Church in Rivington St. The entire work is under the auspices of the City Mission.

Twenty Years Ago a Poor Little Yellow Boy was taken from the streets of Waynesborough, Va., educated and trained for the ministry and for missionary work. To-day, a man of thirty, the Rev. W. H. Sheppard is the most distinguished colored man in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and the only American negro who has ever been made a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society.

The Pekin "Gazette," Said to be the Oldest newspaper in the world, recently celebrated its one thousandth anniversary. Among the vicissitudes of its long life in a despotically-governed country have been the vacancies caused in its editorial staff by the executioner. No less than nineteen hundred of its editors have been beheaded. There is no record of the kind of blunders which were thus punished.

The Scotch Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia has been celebrating its hundred and twenty-ninth anniversary. The church has many interesting associations. The British used it as a hospital during their occupation of the city. Louis Phillippe, king of France, occupied its parsonage while an exile. President John Adams, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, worshipped in the building.

Mr. D. L. Moody Expects to Hold Services at various centres in Texas during the remainder of the winter. Our readers who have seen paragraphs in the daily press giving alarming reports about his being in a critical state of health, will be glad to learn that there is no foundation for them. Mr. Moody called at this office on his way West and was then looking strong and well.

Rev. Thomas Harrison's Services at Bridgeton, N. J., have led to the most remarkable revival that town has ever witnessed. The Bridgeton "Daily Pioneer" says that the interest increased from the start and now the conversation in all circles is on the revival and religious matters. It adds that "Some of the leading business men of the city are coming to God. Persons not in the habit of attending church are being converted." Jan. 29 was fixed by the committee as a day of jubilee over the conversions.

The Board of Indian Commissioners Held a conference on Jan. 16 with the Secretaries of the Denominational Boards doing work among the Indians. Ex-Commissioner Morgan represented the Baptists, and reported progress among the tribes in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. Dr. Ryder, who represented the Congregationalists, said that although his Board had surrendered on principle the government appropriation of $22,000, the work reached thirty tribes and employed a hundred missionaries. The Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal and Friends' Missions were also represented at the Conference.

The Women's Board of Missions of the Congregational Church held its annual meeting in Boston on Jan. 16. Its receipts for the year were $101,878 in contributions, and $24,550 in legacies, a slight decrease on the receipts of the previous year. The report showed that the society is doing valuable work among women in many foreign lands. In European and Asiatic Turkey, in Japan, China, and Zululand progress has been made. It is proposed to open a home in Zululand for the reception of converted Zulu girls who are in danger of being sold into polygamy while they remain in the kraals. The Board has now three lady physicians in the Chinese field.

Particulars about the Death of Dr. W. J. Hall have come in a private letter from his friend and colleague in Korea, Dr. John B. Busteed. It appears that Dr. Hall remained at Pyeng Yang attending to the men wounded in the great battle there until sickness compelled him to leave. He travelled to Seoul on a steamer on which were six hundred Japanese soldiers, suffering from fevers, etc. When he was carried ashore, he was very ill. His case was clearly typhus and there could be no doubt that the disease was contracted among the patients on the steamer. Dr. Busteed and his friends gave him the best attention, but he gradually sank and on Saturday, Nov. 24 he peacefully closed his eyes in death.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE DEAD AND THE LIVING CHRIST.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text: Rev. 1:18: "I am he that liveth, and was dead: and, behold, I am alive forevermore, amen; and have the keys of hell and of death."

THESE are the words of the glorified Jesus to the exiled John. We have in this connection a magnificent description of Christ as he appeared in glory, standing in the midst of the seven candles, clothed with a long garment, and girt with a golden girdle. His hair was white as snow, his eyes were as a flame of fire, his feet like unto fine brass, and his voice like the sound of many waters. In his right hand he had seven stars, and from his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword, and his countenance was like the sun in its splendor. John, overawed by the sight, fell at his feet as if he were dead; but the Glorified One lays his hand tenderly upon the apostle, exhorting him not to fear, assuring him that though he, the triumphant Saviour, was dead, he is now alive forevermore, and has the keys of hell and death. We are not surprised that the apostle, recognizing the presence of a divine being, is greatly alarmed; neither are we surprised that when he recognizes in this glorious personage the Lord Jesus, whom years before he had known so well and loved so tenderly, his fears are allayed, and his soul is filled with peace and joy.

The Dead Christ.

The text teaches us that Christ had been dead. This description at once identifies the glorious Personage who thus appeared to the astonished apostle. To none other would this remarkable description apply Jesus Christ had been truly put to death: he was certainly dead, On this point there can be no doubt. This account carries us back at once to the history of Christ in the gospels. After he had uttered his seventh saying upon the cross his head sank upon his breast, and the Lord of life and glory was dead. The marvel to all who were familiar with his crucifixion was that he should die so speedily. He had been on the cross but about six hours; and we know that often the crucified lingered two or three days before death came to relieve their sufferings. How shall we account for our Lord's speedy death? Several considerations enter into this answer. The exhaustion incident to that long and checkered "night in which he was betrayed," has its part in this answer. We have only to think of the sorrowful passover, of the bloody sweat, of the cruel arrest, of the illegal trials before Annas and Caiaphas, of the arraignment before Pilate and Herod, of the brutal scourging, of the taunting mockeries, and of the physical pain on the cross, to discover reasons for his death so unexpectedly soon. There was also a reason which mere natural causes will not explain. Our Lord was bearing our sins in his own body on the tree; in the hiding of his Father's face, as evidenced by his own agonizing cry, there was a sorrow which no human tongue can explain. Mere physical causes will not account for the early death of one whose proper life gave sound health and a vigorous body. It may be true, as Dr. William Stroud and others have argued, that he died of literal rupture of the heart. This supposition will explain solemn prophecies in the 22d Psalm, as well as some of his own exclamations while upon the cross. This idea has received the endorsement of some critics who are among the ablest physicians, as well as the most reverent believers of our time.

We know that the Romans were accustomed to allow the bodies of the crucified to remain on the cross until they were devoured by birds of prey, or wasted away by decomposition. This fact was one of the elements of the fearful degradation of this form of death. But by a special law the Jews [illegible] sunset; it is certain that this course would be pursued in this case, as the next day was not only the Sabbath, but the Sabbath of the great Passover Feast. The next day was "a high day" and no time is to be lost, as it is now fast westering. We are told that the authorities besought Pilate that the death of the victims might be hastened, so that there might be no desecration of the sanctity of the Sabbath by permitting the dead to remain upon their crosses upon that day. Pilate yielded and gave the necessary orders, and soldiers were sent at once to give them effect.

The Action of the Soldiers in hastening the death of those upon the cross, resulted in immediate death. The soldiers break the legs of the robbers, but we are told that when they came to Jesus "they brake not his legs," and the reason assigned is that they "saw that he was dead already." This is one proof of the actual death of Jesus.

These soldiers little knew that they were fulfilling a prophecy which was uttered fifteen hundred years before — a prophecy which the evangelist John records, "a bone of him shall not be broken." But there was a bare possibility that Jesus might have swooned and that he was not really dead. To make assurance doubly sure, "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water." These soldiers must faithfully perform their duty. This scene produced a profound impression on the mind of the sensitive John. Years after, when he records the event in his gospel, the solemn occasion is reproduced in all its vivid details; and still later, when writing in his epistle, he says: "This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood."

We shall not stop here to discuss the physiological details which this solemn fact suggests, nor to dwell upon the arguments which have arisen in connection with it, but we cannot help noticing that this incident fulfilled another prophecy, of which the same evangelist speaks, "They shall look on him whom they pierced." The flowing of the water and the blood is of great importance in establishing beyond a doubt the reality of Christ's death. The spear-thrust did not cause his death. He was already dead; but if he had not been dead that spear-thrust would certainly have produced death.

The Living Lord.

But we observe, in the next place, that this same Jesus is "alive for evermore." So he affirms in his interview with the disciple whom he loved. This appearance of Christ carries us once more back to the gospel narrative. We remember the new tomb with the great stone placed at its mouth. We remember the placing of Cæsar's great seal and the appointment of the night-watch. We see the soldiers as they pace to and fro during the solemn hours guarding the tomb of the mighty dead; but we learn later that the grave is empty and that the Lord of Life and Glory has burst the bands of death and has overturned the throne of the grim despot who so long had reigned without a rival in the regions of despair and death.

No human eye witnessed the glorious resurrection: it has been well said that often God's sublimest works are wrought in silence and secrecy; but of the resurrection there can be no more doubt than of the death. If the testimonies of these witnesses cannot be taken as conclusive, then no testimony of any witnesses can ever make any historical event certain. The clumsy story of the soldiers and of the chief priests can impose upon no student of the narrative. Christ's resurrection is the great, majestic, and sublime fact of Christianity. We hail him as the Conqueror of sin, the Vanquisher of death, and the Ransomer from the grave. His resurrection is the keystone in the sublime arch of revelation and Christianity. The resurrection of Christ has exalted the poetry, the music, the sculpture, the painting and the literature of the world. It is the proof of all Christ's assertions concerning himself. He staked all on that event. It is the conclusive evidence of all his prophecies concerning himself. It also emphasizes and glorifies the story of his incarnation, of his perfect life, and of his atoning death. The apostles were willing to set that fact forth as a sufficient evidence of the truth they preached. We follow their example.

The Unique Distinction.

Other religions had their great leaders, but they died to live no more; but Christianity's Founder rises to live forever more. We worship a living, and not a dead Christ. The dead Christ is unwelcome in art, and still more unwelcome in religion. We will not make less of the cross on which the Lord of Glory dies, but we will make more of the grave from which he arises in triumph. If we are reconciled to God by the death of his Son, we are still more fully saved by his life.

His resurrection accounts for the existence of the Church. The Christian Church has been and is; that fact no amount of infidelity can deny. But how can we account for the Christian Church, except as we admit the resurrection of the Lord? The first preachers went forth affirming their faith in the resurrection. Were they deceived? Who can so believe? Were they deceivers? Who dare so affirm? The resurrection of the Lord Jesus is a sufficient explanation of the existence of the Church. Deny the resurrection, and you cannot account for the Church. This fact any man may safely affirm in the presence of any student of history. You may challenge any man who denies the resurrection of Christ to account for the existence of the Church. No sensible man will accept the challenge. The resurrection is of Christianity. If it be true, all other miracles are credible. To this miracle the apostles constantly appealed; to it we to-day appeal with the utmost confidence. The Apostle Paul said, "If Christ be not risen your faith is vain," but he was able to add the glorious announcement, "Now is Christ risen." This truth has resounded throughout the world; it is really the creation of a new heaven and earth. Death is disowned; the gates of life and glory are opened. From the night of death the sun of a new life has arisen upon the world. The brightness of that triumphant morning now shines over the earth. The apostles attached the greatest importance to the preaching of the resurrection. To be a witness to this truth was one function of their calling. On the day of Pentecost the Apostle Peter said: "This Jesus hath raised God up, whereof we are all witnesses." Later, when questioned regarding a miracle which had been performed, the same apostle said: "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand before you all." It was said of the apostles a little later, that with great power they gave witness of the resurrection. Than Paul's reasoning in I. Cor. 15, nothing can be more logical or sublime. Every reader of the Gospel has observed what a great proportion of space is given to the events of the three days preceding and following Christ's death—almost as much space as is given to the three preceding years of his life. These facts certainly are remarkably suggestive.

His Dominion.

Christ is shown by this text to be Sovereign over death and Hades. He is here represented as having the keys of death; he holds the key to the vast realms of darkness and death. The word here rendered "hell" refers to the under world, the abode of spirits, the region of the dead. This imagery of a gate and key was natural in a country with walled cities and gates. Death is represented as having reigned in that gloomy abode. He was the inexorable tyrant, the autocratic potentate. No tears could move him, no prayers could bribe him, as he marched forward to receive his victims. Only two in the whole history of our race passed into glory without going through the gates of death. But once, ther entered a strange visitor into that dar realm; he seemed to yield to the power o the tyrant, but only to make that tyrant' overthrow more conspicuous. Death wa astonished; Death was discrowned; Deat was destroyed by the Lord of Life an Glory. We now have nothing to fear. W are Christ's and Christ is King. Deat lies vanquished at his feet. That dark porta can open only by Christ's permission. W need not fear to enter a world which h entered, and from which he returned in tri umph. Because he lives we shall live also Standing by the empty grave of Christ w take up the triumphant words of the apos tle: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? But thank be to God, which giveth us the victor through our Lord Jesus Christ."

This doctrine of resurrection, then, is striking proof of our Lord's divinity. I the resurrection be true, is assured. Disprove the resurrection, an you rob him of the crown of his divinity accept the resurrection, and you must crow him Lord of all. The apostles Peter an Paul indorse these statements; Paul affirm that Christ was, "declared to be the Son o God with power by the resurrection fro the dead." And on Mars Hill he affirm that God will judge the world by Chris because "He hath given assurance unto a men in that he hath raised him from th dead." Christ's whole life was a test testimony to his divine character and mis sion; but his resurrection is the crownin glory of that testimony. He foretold hi resurrection; he affirmed that he had powe to lay down his life and to take it up again The resurrection is the proof of his char acter as a true prophet and as a divine Be ing, for he claimed the power to raise him self from the dead, and if he did raise him self from the dead he was God. He ros from the dead; therefore he is God. Th atonement was finished, not upon the Cros of Calvary, but in the tomb of Joseph. I Christ's work had not been completed an his atonement accepted, he had never rise from the tomb.

Our Lord's Divinity

The resurrection is also

of our resurrection. Christ won this victor not for himself alone. Through the ope grave he has made a way along which a his redeemed may pass. The Good Shep herd goeth before his sheep. Our resur rection depends upon his. When men sa that scientific objections are such tha they cannot believe in the doctrine of th resurrection, we have simply to ask them Did Jesus rise? That is a question of fact Is it true? There are, all admit, difficulties in the doctrine of our resurrection. The are inexplicable; but were there not als difficulties in the resurrection of Christ The difficulties in the case of a general res urrection are not greater, from a strictly sci entific point of view, than those in the cas of the resurrection of Jesus. To believe tha he died and rose again is scientifically a difficult as to believe that we die and ma rise again. He who denies that the dea can rise must also deny that Christ di rise. "But now is Christ risen." Then we too, may rise. All hail, then, thou rise Jesus! Thou art he who once was dead but who now liveth for evermore.

"THE MASTER CARRIES THE KEY."

It is related that the mind of a pious workman, named Thierney, was much oc cupied with the ways of God, which ap peared to him full of inscrutable mysteries The two questions, "How?" and "Why?" were constantly in his thoughts—whethe he considered his own life, or the dispensa tion of Providence in governing the world One day, in visiting a ribbon manufactory his attention was attracted by an extraordi nary piece of machinery. Countless wheel and thousands of threads were twirling in all directions; he could understand nothing of its movements. He was informed, how ever, that all this motion was connected with the centre, where there was a ches which was kept shut. Anxious to under stand the principle of the machine, he asked permission to see the interior. "The mas ter has the key," was the reply. The words were like a flash of light. Here was the an swer to all the perplexed thoughts. Yes the Master has the key. He governs and directs all. It is enough. What need we know more?

The husband, being an exemplary man, will espect his wife's conscientious objections, if he will kindly and lovingly explain them to im. She should show him that they are wellounded and that as a professing Christian she ould be recreant in her duty to her Lord if he countenanced, by her example, an amusement which is apt to lead to grievous harm.

2. What is your opinion in regard to a Christian who is boarding, eating game that the head of the house has hunted and killed on the Lord's day?

1. Possibly some of our readers can supply the verses. They seem to be a paraphrase of the farmer's "Golden Verses" of Pythagoras. 2. Delicacies procured by Sabbath-breaking should be unhesitatingly declined, if one does not wish to share the sin of the Sabbath-breaker.

M E. T., New York. State whether it is proper for a young man to use his wheel on Sunday. A professing Christian is often tempted, and at times has yielded—taking his bicycle ride. A clergyman friend has said, "It is no harm." Others friends say, "It is wrong." Please give your idea, and clear a much vexed and disturbing question.

There are circumstances in which the use of the wheel on Sunday may be justifiable, but they are very few. Wheeling for recreation, for exercise or for any other than duties of actual necessity and works of mercy on that day, are clearly violations of God's law. To use the pretext that it is necessary to ride to church when the latter is within reasonable walking distance, is also wrong. We do not agree with the latitudinarian advice of your clerical friend. If you have yielded where your conscience spoke otherwise, even ever so faintly, you have probably erred, for the conscience is a monitor it is never safe to ignore.

Reader, Gainsville, Mo. 1. Is it true that there is a second blessing by which we can get clear beyond the spiritual joy and power of a converted soul, and after which the sorrows and cares of this life have no power to disturb us? 2. Must we exercise faith for it or may we expect God to give us faith? 3. Would you advise me to urge my sons to join the Freemasons or Odd-fellows?

1. There is the great blessing of sanctification which is far beyond the experience of the newly converted soul. It would be an exaggeration to say that it prevents sorrow and care having the power to disturb; but it enables the subject to bear them bravely, because of the conviction that God controls all the events of life. Sanctification or growth in grace is a continuous process which begins at conversion, and should go on through all the subsequent life. 2. It comes from God through faith. God gives the blessing and faith is the hand that takes it. It is quite proper to ask God for an increase of faith and he will give it. 3. The Editor of this journal does not belong to either of the Orders, so is unable to tell you what advantages or disadvantages may come from joining them.

JESUS AT THE HEART'S DOOR.

BROTHER, at thy heart's door,
The Saviour stands;
The mark of thorns upon his brow,
The print still in his hands;
His eyes behold thee tenderly,
His love no tongue can tell;
Oh, friend, he died on Calvary,
To rescue thee from hell.

How can you keep the door closed
With Jesus there?
Oh, will you not now open wide,
Let Him thy burdens bear?
He patiently is waiting,
Turn not from Him away;
Or you will be a lost soul,
In the awful Judgment day.

ANTICHRIST'S FAITH.

What Prophecy Tells of the Religious Attitude of the Enemy of the Church.

BY AN OXFORD GRADUATE.

ST. JOHN tells us (1. John 4: 3) what the characteristic of the Antichrist should be who is to come; viz., that he shall openly deny our Lord Jesus Christ to be the Son of God come in the flesh from heaven. So exactly and fully was this description to answer to him, that to deny Christ might be suitably called the spirit of Antichrist; and the deniers of him might be said to have the spirit of Antichrist. From which it would appear that Antichrist would be led on from rejecting the Son of God, to the rejection of God altogether.

It seems clear that St. Paul and St. John speak of the same enemy of the Church, from the similarity of their descriptions. They both say that the spirit itself was already at work in their day. "That spirit of the Antichrist," says St. John, "is now already in the world." "The mystery of iniquity doth already work," says St. Paul.

Two other passages of Scripture may be adduced, predicting the same reckless impiety; one from the eleventh chapter of Daniel: "The king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every other god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished."

The other passage is but faintly marked with any prophetic allusion in itself, except that all our Saviour's sayings have a deep meaning, and the Fathers take this in particular to have such. "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive" (John 5: 43). This they consider to be a prophetic allusion to Antichrist, whom the Jews were to mistake for the Christ. He is to come "in his own name." Not from God, as even the Son of God came, not in God's name, not with any pretence of a mission from him, but in his own name, by a blasphemous assumption of Divine power thus will Antichrist come.

Our Lord foretold that many should come in his name, saying, "I am Christ." It was the judicial punishment of the Jews, as of all unbelievers in one way or another, that having rejected the true Christ, they should take up with a false one; and Antichrist will be the complete and perfect seducer, towards whom all previous ones are approximations, according to the text just quoted, "If another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." Hence, considering that Antichrist would pretend to be the Messiah, it was of old the notion that he was to observe the Jewish rites and ceremonies.

Antichrist should "sit in the temple of God;" that is, according to the earlier Fathers, in the Jewish Temple. Our Saviour's own words may be taken to support this notion, because he speaks of "the Abomination of Desolation," which (whatever other meanings it might have), in its fulness denotes Antichrist "standing in the holy place." Further, the persecution of Christ's witnesses which Antichrist will make, is described by St. John as taking place in Jerusalem. "Their dead bodies shall lie in the streets of the great city (which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt), where also our Lord was crucified."

Next, let us ask, Will Antichrist profess any sort of religion at all? Neither true God nor false god will he worship: so far is clear, and yet something more, and that obscure, is told us. Indeed, as far as the prophetic accounts go, they seem at first sight incompatible with each other. Antichrist is to "exalt himself over all that is called God or worshipped." He will set himself forcibly against idols and idolatry, as the early teachers agree in declaring. Yet in the book of Daniel we read, "In his estate shall he honor the God of Forces; and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honor with gold and silver, and with precious stones and pleasant things. Thus shall he do in the most strongholds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory" (Daniel 11: 38-39).

What is meant by the words translated "God of forces," and afterwards called "a strange god," is quite hidden from us, and probably will be so till the event: but anyhow some sort of false worship is certainly predicted as the mark of Antichrist, with this prediction the contrary way, that he shall set himself against all idols, as well as against the true God.

"AS LITTLE CHILDREN."

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Feb. 10. Luke 18: 15-17; Matt. 11: 25, 26.

EVERY Christian's experience demonstrates the sound philosophy of our Lord's teaching as to the beginning of Divine life in the soul. Growth is possible; indeed it is demanded; there is no limit to attainment, but the beginning must be in the spirit of a little child. To this day, he calls little children, the men of childlike spirit, and sets them among his people. That the number does not grow more rapidly is due to the fact that so few follow that child's example and go to him when he calls them. Some postpone going to him till they have had a little more play and pleasure; some are precocious and want to know what he will do with them, being too smart to be entrapped, as they regard it; and some want no dealings with him. He calls, but they do no not respond. The simple, confiding spirit that goes to him willingly and lovingly, places itself without reserve in his hands, is the spirit that he loves to receive. With such material he can make men; he can make sons of God. The most difficult of all to bring into the kingdom are those who, in common parlance, "know it all." Those who can direct their own lives, those who believe that if they lead fairly moral lives, God will overlook any little imperfections, those who want to study the philosophy of salvation and cavil at the doctrines of Christianity—these seldom come to Christ. They have not the spirit of the little child who, asking no questions, raising no objections, simply comes when he is called. That is the first and the essential step. It does not exclude the exercise of intelligence. The very idea of a child suggests one who expects to receive and to learn. Education and training are to follow the first step and at every stage the mind and the conscience must be alert. But the simple confidence that prompts the coming is essential, and the same confidence and rest must continue all the way through making every task acceptable and every burden light. This is the one and only door by which the kingdom can be entered. It is humiliating to the proud, but it is the only way to attainment. It is so at school and at college and in business. Nothing can be done with a boy who has no confidence in his teachers. The more intelligence the boy has the better, but he must be ready to learn, and the teacher is glad to help him. So with Christ. If any one desires to make the best of his life, to live a better life than the animals live, to have higher pursuits, higher principles than the gratification of the body, Christ will help him. He redeems him from sin, from sordid passions and appetites and puts him on a new plane that reaches up to heaven. Princes, statesmen, warriors, scholars have entered through this door with the children and have found it the gate of life.

THREE STATE PRESIDENTS.

Conspicuous among the State Unions of Christian Endeavor Societies are those of Texas, Maryland and Idaho, the Presidents of which we introduce to our readers through their portraits on this page. The Importance of those Unions is coming so rapidly into recognition in the Christian world, that the office of President has taken a representative character, corresponding in religious matters to the office of Governor in politics. There is this also to be said, that as the President of the Christian Endeavor Union does not reach his high office by the peculiar methods in favor in politics, he is much more likely to be truly representative than is the Governor of the State, as he is also likely to be the best man for the office in the State, which is more than can always be predicated of the Governor.

The first of the group is Mr. William Gilmore Bell, President of the Union of the great State of Texas. Mr. Bell is a successful young broker of Austin, a Presbyterian with many titles to respect. First he is the son of a minister closely identified with the Bible Society. Then he has been a church member since he was seventeen years of age and a deacon since he was twenty-three. His connection with the Sunday School has been still longer, and indeed, there were physical reasons why it could not have been longer than it has been. He was elected last year Superintendent of the school, which he entered as a scholar in the Primary Department at three years of age. Mr. Bell is also an active Y. M. C. A. worker and one of the organizers of the institution at Austin.

The second member of the group is Mr. W. H. G. Belt, President of the Maryland Union. Mr. Belt is a Congregationalist, though his early associations were with the Lutheran Church. He is a native of Baltimore and is thirty-eight years of age. He entered commercial life as a boy, but has continued his education through the assistance of Chautauqua, and holds certificates in those courses. His connection with Sunday School and the Young Men's Christian Association prepared him to appreciate the value of Christian Endeavor and he was chosen first President of the local society connected with his church. Subsequently he became the first President of the Union of Baltimore, and has now reached the chair of the State Union.

Rev. Joseph Hughes Barton is the head of the Union in Idaho. He is a Pennsylvanian, but may claim to be a Westerner by a ten years' residence and much valuable work. He is one of those earnest, studious farm boys, whose rudimentary education was a work of difficulty and self-denial, and whose college education was won by his own efforts in school teaching. At Washington and Jefferson College and in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny City, Mr. Barton proved his capacity for scholarship and his native talent for ministerial work. His first charge was at Boise City, Idaho, where he labored for eight years in the First Presbyterian Church. It was a most successful pastorate and his people were grieved to lose him when in obedience to the call of Providence Mr. Barton removed to Caldwell. He was the first President of the Idaho Christian Endeavor Union and is now serving his second term.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN INDIA.

In a letter to a friend Mr. David McConaughy writes from Madras: Our work appears to have entered upon a new phrase—one of organized opposition. Ever since the week of prayer for young men, when a number of Hindu associate members openly asked for prayer, many of our associate members have shown less disposition to attend our meeting; some have given expression to unfriendliness. But in August, one of our associate members, Mr. S. Ramanujam, M.A., B.L., a pleader in the High Court of Madras, was baptized. He belonged to the Comatees, a community of which it is said no member has ever become a Christian. They have the reputation of being more orthodox than the Brahmin. You would hardly believe what a sensation this step of Mr. Ramanujam caused throughout India. And here at once a move was made to counteract the influence of our Asssociation, by forming a Young Men's Hindu Association, on lines as similar as possible to our own, but, of course, lacking the very heart of the matter. One of the native rajahs has contributed 5000 rupees toward a building for the new Association. Our membership has thus been somewhat diminished, but the reaction will not be long in setting in,

If there were nothing to show for the work of the past four years and more, other than the transformation of one home in which I was yesterday, I should feel that our investment had paid a hundredfold. It is the home of Vyramuthu, the assistant Secretary of our Vepery branch, who is one of our brightest trophies. It is two years ago this month that Vyramuthu became a Christian. Since then six other young people—his brother and his wife, his two sisters and both their husbands—have followed his example in following Christ. All of the seven have been publicly baptized within these two years and are shining for Jesus. On Sunday evening after church they carry on open-air preaching in a village near where not long ago they themselves were living as heathen.

A TYPICAL B. Y. P. U. CONFERENCE.

A recent conference of Baptist Young People's Societies at Aurora, Ill., may serve as a model for similar meetings elsewhere and among other societies. One of the members who attended it sends an account of it to the Chicago "Standard." From this writer it appears that this was the first of a series of such conferences projected by the State Executive Committee. The Park Place Church was the place of meeting. Pastor E. H. Brooks, of the First Church, delivered an address of welcome, and Rev. F. R. Swartout, Chairman of the Executive Committee, responded. This was followed by a symposium on the three departments of educational work. Pastor H. W. Reed, of Waukegan, spoke on the Sacred Literature Couse; Pastor F. G. Davis, of Streator, on Missionary Conquest; and Pastor H. J. White, of Joliet, on Bible Study. The symposium was succeeded by an open parliament on the best methods of promoting progress in each department. The remainder of the afternoon session was given up to a consideration of the Junior department. The leaders of the Juniors in the different churches reported marked progress, and spoke hopefully of the spirit manifested by the children. State President Nuveen opened the evening session with an address on the State needs and opportunities, showing in how many ways the B. Y. P. U. could exert a helpful influence. President John H. Chapman, as became his office, took a still wider view, and one quite as encouraging. His recent Western trip convinced him that the young people of all the States were ready and willing to work, and had found the Union a means of combining and concentrating forces. An experience meeting concluded this most interesting conference. We learn that the Executive Committee designs to cover the State from north to south with these conferences, and if this is a sample of what they are to be, they will add greatly to the strength and usefulness of the churches. We bid them Godspeed.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Epworth League of Grace Church, Richmond, Ind., is giving a series of Pentecostal services on successive Monday evenings, conducted by Rev. Dougan Clark.

The report of the first annual meeting of the united C. E. Society for China shows good work and steady. By its means many churches have been kindled into new life and vigor.

When diphtheria and scarlet fever broke out in Saginaw, Mich., last summer, there was found to be no place where the patients could be cared for. So the Endeavorers raised $1,350 with which they erected in connection with the hospital, a special build- for the treatment of diphtheria and scarlet fever, different rooms in the building being furnished by different societies.

The tenth Anniversary of the Young Men's Institute of the Y. M. C. A. of New York was held in the Institute Hall in the Bowery on January 15; William M. Kingsley, Esq., presided. Among the speakers were Mr. Edward M. Shepard, Mr. W. Dulles, Jr., and Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge. The report showed that the Institute was doing an excellent work on educational and social lines, and was exerting a strong religious influence.

Big Rapids, Mich., has an energetic Epworth League. At the recent annual meeting the Secretary reported that a Sunday School has been organized in the country, with one of the leaguers as Superintendent. The Gospel is being preached by another in a district where otherwise there would be none. Other Leagues have been organized; calls have been made on the sick and strangers; bouquets of flowers with Scripture texts attached have been sent to thesick; baskets of clothing to the poor. Paper racks in the depots have been kept supplied with religious literature.

The special appeal on behalf of Missions to the Epworth League was not neglected in India. In Calcutta 220 rupees were given, in Lucknow 175. Societies elsewhere in India brought the total offering up to 458 rupees or about $115.

Responses continue to come in from Christian Endeavor Societies, Baptist Unions and Epworth Leagues to our appeal for the destitute people in Kansas and Nebraska. The contributions are acknowl- on another page. On behalf of the poor for whom bread is thus provided we tender our hearty thanks.

A suggestion is made that an exchange be opened at the Chicago headquarters of the Epworth League for the reception of reports from chapters on the frontier. Many of these chapters know of cases of dire need which could be relieved by the Mercy and Help Departments of city chapters.

Dr. Schell, General Secretary of the Epworth League, announces that there is no longer any doubt about the one-fare rate for the round trip to Chattanooga for those attending the Second International Epworth League Conference, June 27-30. The Southern Passenger Association at its December meeting by a unanimous vote acceded to the request of the committee.

A caution against frauds has been sent out by the International Committee of Young Women's Christian Associations. If an offer is made to any Association to print a year-book containing facts and statistics of the Association with portraits and pictures, to give one thousand copies free and fifty dollars in cash, on condition that the President and Secretary sign a letter recommending merchants to advertise in it, the offer should be rejected. An Association which recently accepted an offer of that kind, now bitterly regrets doing so.

Hindu Homes.

The Child-wives of India and their Offspring—Very Picturesque Dresses—A Famous Maharajah's Household.

THERE is a peculiar charm about everything that relates to India; its social life, apparently as little changed by the passing centuries as its ancient temples and hoary religions, has a special interest for the visitor from other lands. Zenana missionary work, in recent years has given us many interesting glimpses of domestic life in India, and disclosed aspects of character as charming as they were unexpected.

On this page is an illustration representing a typical high-class Hindoo family group—that of the late Maharajah of Mysore. The Maharajah was a great native prince, whose territory lies in southern India, and has an area of nearly 5,000 square miles, with a population exceeding 4,000,000 souls. It has been ruled by a long line of princes, the history of whose conquests and vicissitudes extends backward nearly to the days of the Ptolemies. Cham Rajendra Wadeir, the late Maharajah, (who is seen seated in the group), was a representative of the ancient Hindu line of rulers, and his administration was conducted under British advisement, like that of other Indian princes. The old palace at the capital, Mysore, is a wonderful piece of Indian architecture, adorned within by European artists, and it contains a throne said to have been presented to a former Maharajah by the great Emperor Aurungzebe. A new palace was erected for the late ruler about ten years ago at Bangalore, in which he resided with his family. His family consists of Princess Jaya Lukshammanee the tallest girl of, the group, Princess Cheluva Jammanee, the little tot seated aloft between Jaya and Krishna Raj Wadeir Bahadoor, the new Maharajah (a bright lad of nine years), Kuntee Narsa Raj, the baby of the group, and sedate little Princess Krishnajammanee, who stands with hands folded, on her father's right. All the children wear the sober and somewhat serious expression common to little Hindus of the upper class. The Maharanee is not included in the group.

A Hindu girl of rank wears a dress that would be deemed picturesque anywhere. Soft, clinging material, of rich texture and brilliant colors to please the eye; an abundance of coins strung as necklaces and armlets; earrings so large that they seem to overload the wearer and of such complicated and artistic design that they puzzle the Western beholder. A prominent article of attire is the "saree," a cloth several yards in length, which is gathered into a point in front and fastened around the waist. It is often richly embroidered with gold or silver and being thrown loosely around the entire person, can also be drawn over the head to serve as a veil, when the wearer goes outdoors. Under the saree a fine silk bodice is worn, the whole attire being very becoming. The little princesses in the picture wear the "saree."

Life in Hindu homes is, for the most part, tame and uneventful—little else, as far as the mother is concerned—than a ceaseless round of family cares. When the children happen to be boys, the mother is proud and the father kind, but the birth of a daughter is a disappointment. Such an event the Hindu mother regards as a punishment for some sin she has committed in a former state of existence. Such is Hindu theology. Usually, the babies are a pretty sight, wee plump, brown mites and guiltless of clothing till they reach the toddling age. Around neck and arms are strings of gold coins and these ornaments increase in weight and value as the child grows older. The finest garments are procured for the little ones, and they are made to look very attractive indeed. On the other hand, the greatest possible contrast is presented by the lower classes, who are all garbed pretty much alike, with limbs scarcely covered.

THE LATE MAHARAJAH OF MYSORE AND HIS CHILDREN.

Filial reverence and obedience are regarded among the cardinal virtues in the homes of India. In many, the sweet influence of the Gospel of Jesus has made itself felt, brightening the monotony and giving a new meaning to life. Thousands of Hindustani mothers now teach their children to lisp the sacred Name from earliest infancy.

A Child's Treasures.

Values are relative; so are losses; so are sorrows. One person puts a high estimate on what another deems quite worthless. One grieves over a loss for which another would feel no concern. That which a child values highly may be of no moment to the child's father; but its loss might be as great a grief to the child as would the loss to the father of that which, in the father's sight, is incalulably more important. A little girl was startled by what she heard said at the family table concerning a neighbor's loss of household silver through a visit of robbers. "Mamma," she whispered, "do robbers take dolls?" Her dolls were that child's treasure. If they were in danger, life had new terrors for her. "No, my dear," said her mamma; "robbers don't want dolls. Why should they take them?" "I didn't know but they would want them for their little girls," was the answer. With the assurance that her dolls were safe, that little girl had less fear of midnight robberies. What, to her mind, was the loss of the family silver, or of clothing and jewels, if the dolls were to be left unharmed!

Don't Nag the Children.

"My first child was my best child," said a parent, "and I harmed her for life by over-doing in her training, as I now see, in looking back over my course with her. I thought I must be training her all the time, and I forced issues with her, and took notice of little things, when I would have done better to let her alone. So she was checked unduly, and shut up within herself by my course with her; and she grew up in a rigid and unnatural constraint which ought not to have been hers. I saw my mistake afterward, and I allowed my other children more freedom, by letting them alone except when they must be interfered with; and I've seen the benefit of this course. My rule with all my children, since my first, has been to avoid an issue with them on a question of discipline whenever I could do so safely. And the less show of training there is, in bringing up a child, the better, as I see it."

A Child's Idea of a Lady.

Here are four estimates of "a true lady," as written by four little girls of nine to eleven years:

"A true lady is a girl or woman who is modest, not boisterous, mannerly and polite. Her dress has nothing to do with her actions, though it should be neat, and she should have neat ways.

"Being a lady depends very much upon manners, gentleness and kindness, and if you want to be a lady, you must be a good deal like Christ. A lady consists of fine deeds and actions, not of fine clothes. It takes a modest, good kind girl to make a lady—a woman who is honest and intelligent, and who says and does the kindest things in the kindest way.

"A lady is a well-bred person, whom everyone respects, who is kind to all human beings and dumb animals. A lady is a lady, whether rich or poor.

"A lady is one who is tender-hearted, forgiving, obedient and kind; who has remembered her Creator in her youthful days. Her ways are ways of pleasantness; her price is far above rubies."

CLINGING HANDS.

ALL day, upon my work intent,
My busy feet pace to and fro,
And every energy is bent
Upon each mission as I go:
And ever 'round my fingers twine
These little hands that cling to mine.

"Wait mamma," cries a birdlike voice:
"Don't leave me; I must go, too."
His loving eyes my heart rejoice;
I linger, though I've much to do,
What would life be could I not find
This little hand that clings to mine?

Dear little hands? Oh, guide them, Lord
And keep them pure and clean;
So quick to do with loving might,
Turn them from all things mean
To thine own use I pray Thee, bind
These little hands that cling to mine.

HUMBLE MEXICAN HOMES.

REV. J. W. McLAUGHLIN, writing of a journey in Mexico, gives this interesting description of town and village life: Every now and then one comes upon a little adobe (mud-built) town. Entering one of these adobe cabins at the ever-open door—there are no windows—we find a flat roof, slightly slanted to throw off the rain, with four or five thick wooden beams upon which a few boards and rough sticks are nailed. On the top of these a foot or more of dirt is disposed. The majority have only a thatched covering supported by small branches of trees trimmed for the purpose, over which are placed dried banana leaves. Some of the floors have stone tiles, but most of them consist of uncovered earth. These last are wretchedly unwholesome in the brief rainy season, but the swarthy unclad children are as numerous and active as young chickens.

In some of these cabins dark-hued, native women are seen wearing only a cotton cloth around the lower part of their bodies from the middle, and a short cotton waist over their shoulders without sleeves. Rebosa is the universal garment of the common class of people, and is utilized as a carry-all for babies or bundles. It is worn over the head and shoulders in daytime, when not otherwise in use, and at night is blanket or covering while the owner is asleep.

One sees on his journey down through Mexico many things to indicate that the people are not entirely dead to the luxuries of life. Beside every lowly mud cabin there is a tall oleander. Branches and leaves hidden in gorgeous bloom, imparting a cheerful aspect, even amid all the squalor and the poverty.

Close at hand, on the adobe wall hangs a willow cage, imprisoning a tropical bird of gaudy plumage. Every now and then as we pass through these villages comes the pleasant sound of a guitar, accompanied by a human voice; so these people love birds and flowers and music, and beautiful things. The half effaced image of God must still be on their hearts.

A Father's Love.

There is no better safeguard for a girl than a father's love, writes a noble Christian lady. Every atom of good in me, every scrap of good I have done in the world, I owe to my father—a father who was never too busy or too absorbed to listen to me, or to make his strong, wise, tender heart his girl's refuge in every difficulty. There would be fewer "Refuges" for poor, lost girls if the door of a father's heart had always been open to them, as it was to me. Just see to it that your girl bears the same testimony to you when you are gone, as I do to my father, and not the testimony a little Sunday School girl bore to her father, when her teacher was sympathizing with her over his sudden death. Feeling keenly how much happier and more peaceful her home was now, the child looked up and exclaimed sharply, "Better without him!" That was the child's epitaph over her father's grave—"Better without him!"

A NEW-FASHIONED WOMAN.

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

BY MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A Strange Dawn.

DREARY indeed was the watch in the sick-room with nothing to break its monotony but the sounds of the storm outside. Annie sat and listened to them with an occasional shudder as she thought of the poor homeless creatures who might be exposed to its fury. She wondered why Mrs. Wilkins did not come to bear her company as she had promised. Something must have delayed her. The city clock struck two—a step—not Mrs. Wilkins'—a man's footstep—Dr. Gordon again.

"Mrs. Wilkins will not come," he said softly, stooping to pick off his arctics.

"She will not?"

"No, she cannot. Her little boy is quite sick. As I passed, I saw a light and called in and found her child with spasmodic croup, and I relieved him, and her mind by saying I would take the last part of the night myself."

"Dr. Gordon, you must not do this. I can sit up all night and by myself, too. Indeed, were you to stay, it would not relieve me, for they have shown me no room to occupy, so I cannot lie down. You must not think of staying, indeed, you must not."

"Yes, I must. You cannot sit up alone, and if you have no place to sleep, neither have I. Now! What do you say to that? They are all sleeping sweetly, doing very well, we can only watch, and while we watch, Miss Annie, may I say a few words to you of the past?"

"You may, certainly, yes. My past life is no secret from you, Dr. Gordon, and our long friendship will surely allow us to talk freely of it."

"I wish to speak of the past and present, too, Miss Annie. I have followed you for years with the deepest interest, and I truly mourned with yon in your affliction. You have had more suffering than commonly falls to the lot of mortals, my dear friend, but it was sent in love—a severe blow, but a loving Father dealt it. Can you not see it now?"

"I can. I see the love now, though once I felt it was most cruel. I had to be beaten into the fold, Dr. Gordon—beaten with almost death-dealing stripes. Oh! it was terrible, both the blows and my stubborn, hard heart!"

"Terrible, indeed! I stood off and saw the conflict, witnessed the crushing strokes, and my own heart was sore, and, may I say it? I prayed God to spare you—prayed him to draw you to him by cords of love."

"You prayed for me, Dr. Gordon? I never dreamed of your sympathy, that you ever gave me a passing thought."

She arose with emotion, laid Ginnie down and came and leaned her head against the mantel. He replied:—

"Indeed, you were mistaken. I had always admired you, I do not say I loved you, for my heart was schooled against loving the beautiful pet of society, the pampered child of wealth. Your life was in the world and your thoughts engrossed by its fashion."

"True. It is all true, Dr. Gordon. Once I was the leader, the proud, acknowledged leader of fashionable society; now, thank God, I am in another sense a new-fashioned woman."

"Ah! I have known it—have known it a long time, I can see it; everyone who knows you has seen it. While you were in society I admired; saw and confessed your charms of face, manner, and mind, and I believed that in you were the elements of a grand womanhood; yet I saw no plan for developing these latent powers, saw no future for you, but the unsatisfying one you were shaping for yourself. How different you appear to me now! It seems to me you were never so rich, so lovely, so peerless as right now. 'The fashion of this world passeth away' truly, but your new adorning is forever. Once, I bound my heart with fetters and said, 'thus far shalt thou go and no further.' May I give loose reins now, and let it love you just as much es it longs for love?"

He arose and stood by her. She replied calmly. "No one prizes the love of friends more than I, Dr. Gordon."

He interrupted her—"Don't mistake the love I offer you."

She raised her head, looked at him with surprise and said: "Dr. Gordon, I thought," she paused.

"You thought what?"

"Who was that young lady visiting Captain Roland's this winter?"

"That young lady? She is my half sister."

"Your sister? Why, I heard——"

"What?"

"That you were soon to marry her?"

"And you believed it?"

"I did, certainly."

"Believe only this, then, that I love you with the purest, fondest love that ever a man offered the woman of his heart, and that there is none other in all the broad earth whom I love and whom I want to be my wife but you."

Suddenly opening his arms, he said:

"Will you come, my darling?"

They were around her, she knew not how, never could explain what was said, or how it all came about, but she was then pressed to his heart.

And then the rain-drops danced upon the window-pane, tickled and dashed and splashed—and the trees clapped their hands for joy—and the multiflora peeped through the blinds, sparkling with bright drops—and the wind ceased to wail—and the clouds were rifted—and the moon looked out.

Four o'clock!—day had come!

What a strange, yet what a sweet night!

The sick were all better. Mrs. Wilkins came over to apologize for not coming, and Annie excused her readily. Dr. Gordon had gone for his buggy to carry her home; but since she had promised to breakfast with Mrs. Somers, he would carry her there first, allow her one hour for that meal, and then he would take her home

"Tell Mrs. Somers, Annie, I am coming for her blessing."

"A cosy breakfast was begun by the two ladies alone, for Mrs. Somers' nephew had gone to his store at an early hour.

"Mrs. Wilkins did not come last night, Mrs. Somers," Annie began, for the time was passing and she feared Dr. Gordon's return, before she had prepared the way for his reception.

"Why, how was that? You surely did not sit up all night alone, my child?"

"Yes. Well no, not exactly either," with some embarrassment. "I mean Mrs. Wilkins was not there; her child had the croup and she could not come, of course."

"Did you remain alone with those three sick people through that terrific night?"

"Mostly, yes, but I did not mind that. I had very little trouble, and I feel perfectly well this morning."

"You look rather brighter, rosier, than usual. I expected a pale, hollow eyed woman to breakfast with me."

"These are the simple facts, Mrs. Somers: Dr. Gordon came in, found out the condition of affairs, found me alone with Ginnie in my arms, went to see a patient not far off, saw a light in Mrs. Wilkins' room as he passed by, stopped to inquire why she had not gone over, found her child with croup, relieved him, and her mind about the necessity for her going—came back and declared his intention of staying the rest of the night, and—"

Mrs. Somers looked up with quick inquiry and with woman's instinct caught the truth, and smiling, said:

"Declared also that he would never again leave you alone?"

"Words to that effect, I believe."

And the spoon wouldn't balance on the cup, she couldn't make it, though her eyes and efforts were all directed towards it.

"Well, my dear, I hope you did not send him from you?"

"No, I don't believe I did—well I don't know how it all happened, what led to it, what words were said, and how it all came about."

"But how did it happen?"

"Why I am sure I never dreamed of such a thing before. I certainly thought Dr. Gordon was engaged to be married."

"He is, isn't he?" asked Mrs. Somers laughing; and Annie joined in the laugh as she replied: "Not to the one I supposed. That young lady is his half-sister. It came, I mean the revelation of his love like a flash of lightning. I reproach myself, now, for being so hasty."

"Indeed, you need not reproach yourself. The fact was, your heart was hungry for the love he offered you. You knew him to be noble, far above all men, and when he told you he loved you, your pent up heart just opened and took him right in."

"That is just so, you describe it exactly."

"Then you did exactly right not to keep him waiting. There was no need to defer your answer; only custom, though generally I would prefer to wait, not however in your case. You knew him well, had esteemed him long. I am so glad you have, at last, discovered your adaptation for each other. I have long known that you were suited, and I have prayed God, if it could be his will, to open the eyes of each and show your fitness for each other. Let us go to the sitting-room. I think I heard a buggy drive up."

They went in, and as Dr. Gordon appeared at the door, Mrs. Somers took his hands in both of hers and said: "Doctor, I feel like saying with old Simeon, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.'"

"Not yet, my dear friend," said the doctor, holding her with one hand, and reaching out the other towards Annie. "You must live to see how perfectly we will make our lives accord—how harmoniously we will work together for our Saviour; and you must live to bless us with your counsel and your prayers. I shall take good care of my prize, Mrs. Somers; and I shall not let her kill herself in sympathy for my patients, and sit up alone with them, long, dark, dreary, stormy nights. But good-by, I am going to carry my nurse home to take a good nap, for there's another sphere she must work in now, and she will not work alone any more."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Equally Yoked.

Annie looked radiantly happy and beautiful that night as she entered the parlor, in response to Dr. Gordon's card. She thought, too, that she had never seen so peaceful a look of deep seated joy on the doctor's handsome face. How they talked! How fast time flew! Dr. Gordon pleaded for a speedy marriage, but Annie wished to postpone it till after Christmas. He argued and finally said:

"Now Annie, tell me candidly and freely your reasons for wishing to defer our marriage. You are not as much in love as I am, or you would brook no delay."

"Dr. Gordon you know that I am a teacher in the Female College at R., and I told President Clarke that I would certainly return, and I know that he requires his teachers to give him six months' notice if they intend to leave."

"Six months! Whew! I can't begin to wait that time. I'll write to him, at once, and see if he will not make an exception in your favor."

"Six months will fly rapidly, doctor."

"Indeed they would drag their weary lengths most heavily with me. No, indeed, no six months probation, if you please. Doctors are arbitrary men, have got so in the habit of being minded that they can't stand much opposition, especially when one is dreadfully in love and his sweetheart talks of six months. I shall write over to R. and effect a compromise. Where's Mr. St. Clair? Perhaps he can help me out. Please ask him to step in here for a few minutes."

So Annie went to call her brother. Now Roy had been apprised of the state of affairs, and he entered into them with hearty concurrence. When he and Annie returned together, they found Dr. Gordon pacing up and down the floor with his hands behind him, and his face perplexed. As soon as they entered, he walked up in front of them and said:

"Mr. St. Clair, I'm in a quandary, and my conviction is, you are the only man that can help me out."

"Well, for what amount?" asked Ro with mock gravity, pulling out his penci "I've gone security for a good many unfo tunates, and I expect I can stand one more.

"It's not exactly that kind I want, bu its a man I want you to secure me agains and a woman I want you to secure for m and at once."

"Oh! a woman's in it, is she? They a generally at the bottom of all the mischi in this world. Well, first tell me what can do and I'm at your service.

Then the case was stated, the cause Annie's objections, for which she could s no remedy. After the whole thing was e plained, Roy said:

"Annie please excuse us for a few m ments. I will take Dr. Gordon to the libra where pen and ink are more convenient; f in these security papers I must have an u mistakable signature in black and whit Go to the piano and play something, till w come back."

"Yes, Annie," said Dr. Gordon, ste ping back, "play 'Raindrops' and thin what sweet music they made for me la night."

When they were in the library with do closed, seated facing each other, while t rippling notes of the piano floated aroun Roy said:

"Dr. Gordon, there is a secret about n sister's teaching, and while I shall tell yo yet it must ever remain a secret betwe us. Yes, I know you are impatient to g back to her, but patience, my dear fello the end will come after awhile. I scout the idea of her teaching, I told her that n property belonged to her as much as it d to me, and when she found how the su ject pained me, she quit urging it. Wh our physician said that in her physical a mental condition she must be put to wor that would be healthy for body and brai as my last resort, her only chance for covery, in tears I told him of her former sire to teach in a college. He caught at t idea, and it was arranged between us t he was to write to his friend Preside Clarke, the College in R——, and he w to tell him her true condition. He was secure a situation for her in the departme of music and painting, and I was to p her salary. Oh, I could not allow him pay Annie! I paid both salary and boa indeed I would not consent to the arran ment without this stipulation."

"Mr. St. Clair," said Dr. Gordon, I lo and admire you more than ever, my bro er. You have acted a noble part."

"Well, you see the case was peculiar. troubled me no little, but Dr. Kipley s he would see her safe to the college, a afterward make every arrangement for health and comfort, and he did. His p scription worked a miracle. I have ne seen her so bright, so uniformly happy, her gay life, surrounded by hosts of mirers, and all that wealth could buy have seen her lighthearted and sparkl with exuberance of joy, but now she s constantly happy. She seems never think of herself now, lives for others al the time."

"She says, Mr. St. Clair, that once was a fashionable member of society, now that she is a new fashioned woma a different sense and it is true. Hers is a life of beautiful self-abnegation. Now lives for Christ."

"If religion makes everybody so lov so angelic, would that I and all of my f ily, and it, too!"

"Would that you had, Mr. St. Clat

"Well, Dr. Gordon, going back to subject, you see there is no six month's tice to be given in Annie's case, for I was a peculiar contract to be annul whenever I pleased. Tell her, I thou she might grow weary of teaching, and ranged so that her contract might close day. Don't tell her all the truth it w mortify her. And now, sir; I have gi my consent most cheerfully to my sis giving up teaching, but not exactly to being your wife. I had hoped that would never leave us. How can we without Annie!"

"You can live without her, Mr. St. C far better than I can, and I promise y shall not do without her long, now you have removed this obstacle from path. Well, Sir, if you won't cons you will let us marry in your house, w you? That is the way indulgent, forgi fathers do."

"Yes, I will let you have the parlor, I tell you doctor, I don't like it."

"Well, Mr. St. Clair, I do."

ting inscription were the words of his own uttering :

"Not one drop of white man's blood is on these hands!"

A DREAM OF JUDGMENT.*

"I HAD a dream; a dream I can never forget. Jesus had come again to earth. He stood on the steps of the New York City Hall, and an immense crowd of people listened to his words. Every one knew who was speaking, and all listened with the most profound attention. And lo! a miracle was being performed: cars and wagons passed up and down the streets, on both sides of the park, and all the life of a busy city went on as usual, but not a sound came to distract the attention of the audience.

Every sound was hushed, save the voice of the speaker. I never in all my life heard such sweetness. Even in the midst of his fiercest denunciations there was a tremulous softness in the voice, as if he strove to win them by love, and would fain clasp to his loving bosom even the Pharisees he was denouncing. This is what he said :

" 'The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat, just as they did in the olden time, in the city of David, and they are of the same pattern, and care as much for the people's welfare as did the Pharisees of old. They open saloons, and say unto the people, 'Drink, drink;' and when men have well drunken, then they lead them, as sheep to the slaughter, to deposit their votes so that these saloon-keepers may be kept in power. And these pot-house politicians love the uppermost seats at feasts, and greetings in the market, and to have clubs and associations named after them, and to be called of men, 'The Boss.' And they say unto their followers, 'Would you like to get a job on the public works? then vote for us, and ye shall have it.'

" 'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, ye legislators and rulers of towns and cities! for ye bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, on men's shoulders, but you will not move them with one of your little fingers. Woe unto you! for ye license race-tracks and gambling-hells, that ye may debauch the people, and blind their eyes to your shortcomings. Woe unto you! for a day is coming when ye will be sent to perdition; a day is at hand when the people, with eyes opened to your enormities, will hurl you from power, as Satan was hurled from heaven.

" 'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, ye money-changers and usurers, who beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor! Ye speculators, who speculate in the very life-blood of the people! Ye say, 'Let us raise the price of wheat and corn, and make great gain,' well knowing that your brethren must suffer for your selfishness. Ye fools and blind! know ye not that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches? What will your wealth avail, when the people arise in their wrath, and sweep you from the earth?

*From Christ the Socialist; a story by the author of Philip Meyer's Scheme. Pp. 357: price 50 cents. Published by The Arena Publishing Company, Copley Square, Boston. Perhaps a better title for this book might have been, "the Gospel of the Golden Rule." It shows in a vivid, forcible way how much happier the world would be if Christ's teachings were practically obeyed in our relations with each other.

A MILLIONAIRE.

I'M a millionaire, my comrades,
I'm a millionaire to-day;
Not in this world's fading riches;
No, my wealth is far away.

High in heaven I've stored my treasure,
Where no thief can enter in;
Yes, I've wealth there without measure,
In that land all free from sin.

I've a mansion in yon city
That outshines the noon-day sun;
And when this world fades in darkness,
Life on earth forever gone—

Brighter still my heavenly mansion,
As eternal ages roll,
Shall loom up in wondrous beauty,
In that loved home of the soul.

Though ten thousand times ten thousand
Worlds like this were all my own;
Though I sat in gorgeous splendor,
Ruling from a kingly throne—

What could gold and silver give me?
How could earthly fame and power
Cheer and comfort or befriend me.
In the gloom of death's dark hour?

Give me then enduring riches,
Treasures stored at God's right hand,
In that city of all cities,
With its scenes so wondrous, grand.

There to live through endless ages,
With my Saviour, God's dear Son:
Joining in the glad hosannas,
With the loved ones 'round His throne.

Richmond, Ind. —J. CHARLES.

THE RUM TRAFFIC IN AFRICA.

The love of money, says a missionary writer, has brought about such a terrible state of affairs in the Congo State that the battle will be between the Bible and the bottle. The love of money has sent concoctions termed rum, for which no market could be found in England, to be poured down the throats of the helpless blacks. The African cannot withstand brandy, gin and rum. He never can be a moderate drinker; let him once indulge and an appetite is formed over which he has no control, and when under its influence is a maddened demon.

Joseph Thomson, who has led three expeditions into Eastern Central Africa, writes: "I travelled and suffered, inspired by the idea that I was doing good in opening new lands to commerce and civilization; but all satisfaction was blighted as I felt that what little I had done was better undone, and Africa had better remain the dark continent, if such must be the end of it all. Underneath the cry for gin I seem to hear the reproach, 'You see what Christians have made us. You talk of peace and good will, yet put devils into us.' As things stand in many places, I translate this cry of opening Africa to civilizations, as really opening it to European vices, old clothes, gin, rum, powder and guns. Truly liquor has been well termed 'the devil in solution.'"

A DAY OF PRAYER.

The International Committee of the B. Y. P. U. A recommend that Sunday, April 21, be observed as a special day of prayer for the young people's work, and of consecrated giving for its wide extension. It is suggested that the day be hereafter known as Founders' Day. A special programme for an appropriate service will be furnished free by the International Union to those societies of young people that will observe the day, and will make an offering in connection with the observance for the International work.

LOVE THAT BROUGHT LIFE.

'TWAS love that brought life unto man,
'Twas love that brought death to the Lord;
It gave him the grave
That our souls he could save,
And grant us eternal reward.

'Twas wonderful, wonderful love
That brought such a Saviour to men—
The grace he imparts
Is the song that our hearts
Sing over and over again.

'Twas love—oh! Compassionate love
That willingly suffered and died—
That counted death small
And could sacrifice all
That we might in glory abide.

Oh, come to the fountain of love:
Where every poor sinner may go—
That fountain so free
Is for you and for me—
And washes us whiter than snow.

'Twas wonderful love—
It was wonderful love
That bore all its burden of pain—
And wherever I am
I will sing of the Lamb—
The Lamb that for sinners was slain.

Ineland, N. J. —CARRIE ELLIS BRECK.

AN UNSATISFACTORY EXCUSE.

DURING a visit to London," says Mr. Marchmont, "my friend Mr. Murray made the acquaintance of a young man, to whom as was his habit he put the question, 'My friend, are you one of the Lord's people?' The young man frowned and sullenly replied, 'No, I am not, and I do not wish to be.' 'Can you give me any reason for what you say?' continued the clergyman, quite unperturbed. 'Oh, yes, I can give a reason, and a good one.' 'May I ask what it is?' 'Well, just twenty years ago I was in a professing Christian's kitchen, and he, finding me there, swore at me, and kicked me out. From that time I resolved never to have anything to do with religion, and I never have.' 'And you have thoroughly made up your mind to continue in that course?' 'Certainly I have.' 'Then let us put it in writing,' he said; and with that, he wrote down the young man's words and handed the paper to him, saying, 'Take this, my friend, and when you are asked for your excuse on the Day of Judgment, hand this up.' The man took it mechanically, scarcely realizing what he did, and they parted. Mr. Murray had got home; prayers had been said, and he was on his way to his own room, when the door-bell rang.

"As he was in the hall he opened the door himself, there was the young man to whom he had spoken that day. 'What is the matter now, my friend? Can I do anything more for you?' he asked. Holding up the little slip of paper, and trembling perceptibly, the young fellow said, 'Oh, Mr. Murray. I want to talk this over with you. It will not hold water. When I look at it in black and white I see it will not do for me to reject the Lord Jesus Christ for such a paltry excuse. I cannot continue to do it; is there hope for me' Very kindly he was drawn into the house, and the clergyman asked, 'Is this excuse of twenty years' standing not sufficient for you?' 'No, it is not.' 'Then we will throw it into the fire, and, suiting the action to the word, the paper was cast into the flames. Together they knelt down, and after praying to God to save the poor sinner who knelt before him, they rose and gave praise to the Lord for all his goodness; and the mad went away renewed in heart, resolving to serve the Lord from that time onward."

THE WALDENSES IN AMERICA.

A Little Godly, Primitive Colony in North Carolina—Descendants of the Brave and Pious Vaudois Who have Settled Here—A Sober, God-fearing People.

IN Northwestern Italy a series of valleys of rare beauty are enclosed by the crescent range of the Cottian Alps. A more picturesque region than this it would be difficult to find in Europe anywhere. Its sequestered shades, its beautiful groves and waterfalls, its dark gorges, and its snow-capped mountains attract the notice and ravish the eye of the passing traveler. These valleys are the homes of the Waldenses, a people whose history is as marvellous as the physical features of the country are beautiful and picturesque. Here, through ages of relentless persecution God has preserved, sometimes almost miraculously, a little company of the "faithful," who have clung tenaciously, to the "faith once delivered to the saints." These people have been called "The Israel of the Alps." Milton has perpetuated the memory of their sufferings and trials in the familiar lines:

Thy slaughtered saints whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones.

They trace their descent from the Apostolic age, and number among their ancestors Christians who fled from Rome during the persecutions of Nero. Even Apostles, it is affirmed, preached the Gospel in their valleys, and from father to son the truth has been handed down "from time immemorial." This historic church, more commonly called the "Vaudois," is a member of the great "Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system," though with reason they refuse to be called "Reformed," saying "we have never been deformed."

It is not a matter of surprise, therefore, that a recent immigration of a large number of these Waldenses to North Carolina should have excited such widespread interest. The first company of these new settlers arrived in this country eighteen months ago, about twenty families, who came to prepare the way for a larger number, who followed some six or eight months afterward. The colonists now number about two hundred and fifty. There are in all fifty men, heads of families. They are generally young married couples. One-third of the whole number are less than ten years of age. The occasion of this emigration from their native Italian valleys was the overcrowded condition of their population and a natural ambition among the poorer classes to better their condition by seeking homes in the New World. The property now owned by the colonists in Burke county, North Carolina, several thousand acres of good land, was purchased upon most favorable terms from a local land company. The purchase was made only after careful investigation by one of their native pastors, the Rev. Teofilo Gai, and a committee of farmers from their own country. The land is situated about eight miles east from Morganton, the county seat. It is well timbered with oak and pine, has numerous streams of pure water, is well suited to grape and fruit culture, and lies in part within the celebrated thermal belt, of which so much has been written in recent years. The colony is a corporation, chartered under the laws of the State, and is governed by a board of directors, consisting of six Waldenses and three Americans. The writer of this sketch is a member of the board, and its president. Recently it has been determined that the best interests of the colony would be promoted by the dissolution of its corporate life and a holding of the land in severalty. If this scheme is effected, the land will be divided among the colonists, each family owning from forty to one hundred acres, each free-holder assuming his proportionate part of the debt contracted by the community. The time of the colonists, since their arrival in this country, has been actively spent in clearing their land, building homes, setting out vines and fruit trees, and in making themselves as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

The village, "Valdese," now a station on the N. C. R. R., a branch of the Southern Railway, is the post-office of the colony, and the site of church and school, of store and hosiery mill. The traveller as he passes to and fro on this great railway line is always interested in the new village which has sprung up, and heads are always projected from car-windows to obtain a view of any Waldensian, who may by chance be within sight. These newcomers have awakened the interest of all classes in their adopted State. The area of the village includes about twenty acres and has been regularly and tastefully laid off into streets and building lots. The town lots are held in trust to be sold for the benefit of Church and school.

The Waldenses are generally of low stature, they are short, stout, thick-set. It is said that the higher the altitude of their native Italian home, the shorter are they in stature. Their complexion is dark; their eyes are bright and intelligent; their faces vivacious. Their dress always attracts attention, especially that of the women, with their white head-dresses of pretty, antique design, and of the young girls with bright-colored handkerchiefs neatly tied around their necks. OPPORTUNITY.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, New York. Text: Gal. 6: 10: "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good."

AT Denver, Colorado, years ago, an audience had assembled for divine worship. The pastor of the church for whom I was to preach that night, interested in the seating of the people, stood in the pulpit looking from side to side, and when no more people could be crowded within the walls, he turned to me and said, with startling emphasis: "What an opportunity!" Immediately that word began to enlarge, and while a hymn was being sung, at every stanza the word "opportunity" swiftly and mightily unfolded, and while the opening prayer was being made, the word piled up into Alps and Himalayas of meaning, and spread out into other latitudes and longitudes of significance until it became hemispheric, and it still grew in altitude and circumference until it encircled other worlds, and swept out, and on, and around until it was as big as eternity. Never since have I read or heard that word without being thrilled with its magnitude and momentum. Opportunity! Although in the text to some it may seem a mild and quiet note, in the great Gospel harmony it is a staccato passage. It is one of the loveliest and awfulest words in our language of more than one hundred thousand words of English vocabulary. "As we have opportunity, let us do good."

What is an opportunity? The lexicographer would coolly tell you it is a conjunction of favorable circumstances for accomplishing a purpose; but words cannot tell what it is. Take a thousand years to manufacture a definition, and you could not successfully describe it. Opportunity! The measuring rod with which the Angel of the Apocalypse measured heaven could not measure this pivotal word of my text. Stand on the edge of the precipice of all time and let down the fathoming line hand under hand, and lower down and lower down, and for a quintillion of years let it sink, and the lead will not strike bottom. Opportunity! But while I do not attempt to measure or define the word, I will, God helping me, take the responsibility of telling you something about opportunity.

First, it is very swift in its motions. Sometimes within one minute it starts from the throne of God, sweeps around the earth, and re-ascends the throne from which it started. Within less than sixty seconds it fulfilled its mission.

In the second place opportunity never comes back. Perhaps an opportunity very much like it may arrive, but that one never. Naturalists tells us of insects which are born, fulfill their mission, and expire in an hour; but many opportunities die so soon after they are born that their brevity of life is incalculable. What most amazes me is that opportunities do such overshadowing, far-reaching and tremendous work in such short earthly allowance. You are a business man of large experience. The past eighteen months have been hard on business men. A young merchant at his wits' end came into your office or your house, and you said, "Times are hard now, but better days will come. I have seen things as bad, or worse, but we got out, and we will get out of this. The brightest days that this country ever saw are yet to come." The young man to whom you said that was ready for suicide, or something worse, namely, a fraudulent turn to get out of his despairful position. Your hopefulness inspired him for all time, and thirty years after you are dead he will be reaping the advantage of your optimism. Your opportunity to do that one thing for that young man was not half as long as the time I have taken to rehearse it.

In yonder third gallery you sit, a man of the world, but you wish everybody well. While the clerks are standing round in your store, or the men in your factory are taking their noon spell, some one says, "Have you heard that one of our men has been converted at the revival meeting in the Methodist Church?" While it is being talked over you say, "Well, I do not believe in revivals. Those things do not last. People get excited, and join the church, and are no better than they were before. I wish our men would keep away from those meetings." Do you know, oh man, what you did in that minute of depreciation? There were two young men in that group who that night would have gone to those meetings and been saved for this world and the next, but you decided them not to go. They are social natures. They already drink more than is good for them, and are disposed to be wild. From the time they heard you say that, they accelerated their steps on the downward road. In ten years they will be through with their dissipations, and pass into the Great Beyond. That little talk of yours decided their destiny for this world and the next. You had an opportunity that you misimproved, and how will you feel when you confront those two immortals in the last judgment and they tell you of that unfortunate talk of yours that flung them over the precipice? Oh, man of the world, why did you not say in that noon spell of conversation, "Good! I am glad that man has got religion. I wish I had it myself. Let us all go to-night. Come on; I will meet you at the church door at eight o'clock." You see, you would have taken them all to heaven, and you would have got there yourself. Opportunity!

The day I left our country home to look after myself, we rode across the country, and my father was driving. Of course I said nothing that implied how I felt. But there are hundreds of men here, who from their own experience know how I felt. At such a time a young man may be hopeful, and even impatient, to get into the battle of life for himself, but to leave the homestead where everything has been done for you; your father or older brothers taking your part when you were imposed on by larger boys; and your mother always around, when you got the cold, with mustard applications for the chest, or herb tea to make you sweat off the fever, and sweet mixtures in the cup by the bed to stop the cough, taking sometimes too much of it because it was pleasant to take; and then to go out with no one to stand between you and the world, gives one a choking sensation at the throat, and a home-sickness before you have got three miles away from the old folks. There was on the day I spoke of a silence for a long while, and then my father began to tell how good the Lord had been to him, in sickness and in health, and when times of hardship came how Providence had always provided the means of livelihood for the large household; and he wound up by saying, "De Witt, I have always found it safe to trust the Lord." My father has been dead thirty years, but in all the crises of my life—and there have been many of them—I have felt the mighty boost of that lesson in the farm-wagon: "De Witt, I have always found it safe to trust the Lord." The fact was, my father saw that was his opportunity, and he improved it. This is one reason why I am an enthusiastic friend of all Young Men's Christian Associations. They get hold of so many young men just arriving in the city, and while they are very impressionable, and it is the best opportunity. Why, how big the houses looked to us as we first entered the great city; and so many people! It seemed some meeting must have just closed to fill the streets in that way; and then the big placards announcing all styles of amusements, and so many of them on the same night, and every night, after our boyhood had been spent in regions where only once or twice in a whole year there had been an entertainment in schoolhouse or church. That is the opportunity. Start that innocent young man in the right direction. Six weeks after will be too late. Tell me what such a young man does with his first six weeks in the great city, and I will tell you what he will be throughout his life on earth, and where he will spend the ages of eternity. Opportunity!

We all recognize that commercial, and literary, and political successes depend upon taking advantage of opportunity. The great surgeons of England feared to touch the tumor of King George IV. Sir Astley Cooper looked at it and said to the king: "I will cut your majesty as though you were a plowman." That was Sir Astley's opportunity. Lord Clive was his father's dismay, climbing church steeples and doing reckless things. His father sent him to Madras, India, as a clerk in the service of an English officer. Clive watched his time, and when war broke out came to be the chief of the host that saved India for England. That was Lord Clive's opportunity. Pauline Lucca, the almost matchless singer, was but little recognized until in the absence of the soloist in the German choir she took her place and began the enchantment of the world. That day was Lucca's opportunity. John Scott, who afterward became Lord Eldon, had stumbled his way along in the practice of law until the case of Ackroyd vs. Smithson was to be tried, and his speech that day opened all avenues of success. That was Lord Eldon's opportunity. William H. Seward was given by his father a thousand dollars to get a collegiate education. That money soon gone his father said, "Now, you must fight your own way," and he did, until gubernatorial chair, and United States senatorial chair were his, with a right to the presidential chair, if the meanness of American politics had not swindled him out of it. The day when his father told him to fight his own way was William H. Seward's opportunity. John Henry Newman, becalmed a whole week in an orange boat in the strait of Bonifacio, wrote his immortal hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light." That was John Henry Newman's opportunity. You know Kirk White's immortal hymn, "When Marshalled on the Nightly Plain." He wrote it in a boat by a lantern on a stormy night as he was sailing along a rocky coast. That was Kirk White's opportunity.

The importance of making the most of opportunities as they present themselves is acknowledged in all other directions; why not in the matter of usefulness? The difference of usefulness of good men and women is not so much the difference in brain, or social position, or wealth, but in equipment of Christian common sense: to know just the time when to say the right word or do the right thing. There are good people who can always be depended on to say the right thing at the wrong time. A merchant selling goods over the counter to a wily customer who would like to get them at less than cost; a railroad conductor while taking up the tickets from passengers who want to work off a last year's free pass, or get through at half rate a child fully grown; a housekeeper trying to get the table ready in time for guests, although the oven has failed to do its work, and the grocer has neglected to fulfill the order given him: those are not opportunities for religious address. Do not rush up to a man in the busiest part of the day, and when a half dozen people are waiting for him, and ask, "How is your soul?"

But there are plenty of fit occasions. It is interesting to see the sportsman, gun in hand and pouch at side, and accompanied by the hounds yelping down the road, off on hunting expedition, but the best hunters in this world are those who hunt for opportunities to do good, and the game is something to gladden earth and heaven. I will point out some of the opportunities. When a soul is in bereavement is the best time to talk of Gospel consolation and heavenly reunion. When a man has lost his property is the best time to talk to him of heavenly inheritances that can never be levied on. When one is sick is the best time to talk to him about the supernatural latitude in which unhealth is an impossibility. When the Holy Spirit is moving on a community is the best time to tell a man he ought to be saved. By a word; by a smile; by a look; by a prayer, the work may be so thoroughly done that all eternity cannot undo it. As the harp was invented from hearing the twang of a bowstring; as the law of gravitation was suggested by the fall of an apple; as the order in India for the use of a greased cartridge started the mutiny of 1857, which appalled the nations: so something insignificant may open the door for great results. Be on the watch. It may be a gladness; it may be a horror; but it will be an opportunity.

A city missionary in the lower parts of the city found a young woman in wretchedness and sin. He said, "Why do you not go home?" She said, "They would not receive me at home." He said, "What is your father's name, and where does he live?" Having obtained the address and written to the father, the city missionary got a reply, on the outside of the letter the word "immediate" underscored. It was the heartiest possible invitation for the wanderer to come home. That was the city missionary's opportunity. And there are opportunities all about you, and on them written by the hand of the God who will bless you, and bless those whom you help, in capitals of light, the word "IMMEDIATE."

A military officer very profane in his habits was going down into a mine at Cornwall, England, with a Christian miner, for many of those miners are Christians. The officer used profane language while in the cage going down. As they were coming up out of the mine the profane officer said, "If it be so far down to your work, how much farther would it be to the bottomless pit?" The Christian miner responded, "I do not know how far it is down to the place, but if this rope should break you would be there in a minute." It was the Christian miner's opportunity. Many years ago a clergyman was on a sloop on the Hudson River, and hearing a man utter blasphemy, the clergyman said, "You have spoken against my best Friend, Jesus Christ." Seven years after, this same clergyman was on his way to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, when a young minister addressed him and asked him if he was not on a sloop on the Hudson River seven years before? The reply was in the affirmative. "Well," said the young minister, "I was the man whom you corrected for using that oath. It led me to think and repent, and I am trying to atone somewhat for my early behavior. I am a preacher of the Gospel, and a delegate to the General Assembly." Seven years before on the Hudson River sloop was the clergyman's opportunity.

I stand this minute in the presence of many heads of families. I wonder if they all realize that the opportunity of influencing the household for Christ and heaven is very brief, and will soon be gone? For a while the house is full of the voices and footsteps of children. You sometimes feel that you can hardly stand the racket. You say, "Do be quiet! It seems as if my head would split with all this noise." And the legs get broken and ruined, and it is, "Where's my hat!" "Who took my books?" "Who has been busy with my playthings?" and it is a-rushing this way, and a-rushing that, until father and mother are well-nigh beside themselves. It is astonishing how much noise five or six children can make and not half try. But the years glide swiftly away. After awhile the voices are many, and those which stay are more ate. First this room gets quiet, and n that room. Death takes some, and rriage takes others, until after awhile the se is awfully still. That man yonder ld give all he is worth to have that boy is gone away forever rush into the room e more with the shout that was once ught too boisterous. That mother who s once tried because her little girl, now e forever, with careless scissors cut up nething really valuable, would like to e the child come back, willing to put in hands the most valuable wardrobe to as she pleases. Yes! Yes! The house sy now will soon be still enough, I war- t you; and as when you began house- ping, there were just two of you, there be just two again. Oh, the alarming ity of infancy and childhood! The portunity is glorious, but it soon passes. rents may say at the close of life, "What ity we did not do more for the religious lfare of our children while we had them th us!" But the lamentation will be of avail. The opportunity had wings and anished. When your child gets out of cradle let it climb into the outstretched ms of the beautiful Christ. "Come thou d all thy house into the ark."

But there is one opportunity so much ghter than any other; so much more in- ing, and so superior to all others that re are innumerable fingers pointing to it, d it is haloed with a glory all its own. s yours! It is mine! It is the present ur. It is the now. We shall never have again. While I speak and you listen the portunity is restless as if to be gone. You not chain it down. You cannot imprison You cannot make it stay. All its pulses throbbing with a haste that cannot be dered or controlled. It is the opportuni of invitation on my part, and acceptance your part. The door of the palace of d's mercy is wide open. Go in. Sit wn, and be kings and queens unto God ever. "Well," you say, "I am not ady." You are ready. "Are you a sin- ?" "Yes." "Do you want to be saved w and forever?" "Yes." "Do you be ve that Christ is able and willing to do e work?" "Yes." Then you are saved. ou are inside the palace door of God's ercy already. You look changed. You e changed. "Hallelujah, 'tis done!" id you ever see anything done so quick ? Invitation offered and accepted in less an a minute by my watch or that clock. ir Edward Creasy wrote a book called, The Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, om Marathon to Waterloo." But the most ecisive battle that you will ever fight, and e greatest victory you will ever gain, is is moment when you conquer first your- elf, and then all the hindering myrmidons f perdition by saying, "Lord Jesus, here I m, undone and helpless, to be saved by hee, and thee alone." That makes a panic hell. That makes celebration in heaven.

On the 11th of January, 1866, a collier- rig ran into the rocks near Walmer Beach, England. Simon Pritchard stand- ng on the beach threw off his coat and said, "Who will help me save that crew?" Twenty men shouted, "I will," though only seven were needed. Through the aw- ul surf the boat dashed, and in fifteen min- tes from the time Pritchard threw off his coat all the shipwrecked crew were safe on the land. Quicker work to-day. Half that time more than necessary to get all this assemblage into the life-boat of the Gospel, and ashore, standing both feet on the Rock of Ages. By the two strong oars of faith and prayer first pull for the wreck and then pull for the shore. Opportunity!

Over the city went the cry,
Jesus of Nazareth passeth by!

Let the world go. It has abused you enough, and cheated you enough, and slan- dered you enough, and damaged you enough. I like what the good man said to one who had everything but religion. The affluent man boasted of what he owned, and of his splendors of surroundings, put- ting into insignificance, as he thought, the Christian's possessions. "Ah!" said the Christian, "man, I have something you have not." "What is that?" said the worldling. The answer was, "Peace!" And you may all have it—peace with God; peace with the past; peace with the future, a peace that all the assaults of the world, and all the bombardments satanic, cannot interfere with.

A Scotch shepherd was dying and had the pastor called in. The dying shepherd said to his wife, "Mary, please to go into the next room, for I want to see the minis- ter alone." When the two were alone the dying shepherd said, "I have known the Bible all my life, but I am going, and I am 'afeered to dee.'" Then the pastor quoted the Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want." "Yes, mon," said the shepherd, "I was familiar with that before you were born, but I am a-goin,' and I am afeered to dee." Then said the pastor, "You know that the Psalm says, 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." "Yes," said the dying shepherd, "I knew that before you were born, but it does not help me." Then said the pastor, "Don't you know that sometimes when you were driving the sheep down through the valleys and ravines there would be shadows all about you, while there was plenty of sun- shine on the hills above? You are in the shadows now, but it is sunshine higher up." Then said the dying shep- herd, "Ah! that is good. I never saw it that way before. All is well. 'Though I pass through the valley of the shadow of death, thou art with me.' Shadows here, but sun- shine above.' So the dying shepherd got peace. Living and dying may we have the same peace! Opportunity! Under the arch of that splendid word let this multitude of my hearers pass into the pardon, and hope, and triumph of the Gospel. Go by companies of a hundred each. Go by regiments of a thousand each. The aged leaning on the staff; the middle-aged throwing off their burdens as they pass; and the young to have their present joys augmented by more glorious satisfactions. Forward into the kingdom!

As soon as you pass the dividing line there will be shouting all up and down the heavens. From the Imperial Gardens the wreaths will be twisted for your brow, and from the halls of Eternal Music the harpers will bring their harps, and the trumpeters their trumpets, and all up and down the amethystine stairways of the castles, and in all the rooms of the House of Many Mansions, it will be talked over with holy glee that this day while one plain man stood on the platform of this vast building giving the Gospel Call, an assemblage made up from all parts of the earth and piled up in these galleries, chose Christ as their portion, and started for Heaven as their everlasting home. Ring all the bells of Heaven at the tidings! Strike all the cymbals at the joy! Wave all the palm branches at the triumph! Victory! Victory!

The Waldenses in America.

is struck with the bright, intelligent faces of the little children.

They are taught to read and write when very young. It is a noteworthy fact that every child is able to read in French and Italian, besides speaking a patois, by the time he reaches the age of ten or twelve. They seem anxious to learn and are rapidly acquiring the language of their adopted country; the little ones more rapidly than their elders, as is always the case.

Among the characteristics of this people there should be noted as prominent a whole-souled courtesy. This appears to be a race characteristic. Speak to one of them, from the youngest little lad to the oldest among them, and with a sweeping bow he stands hat in hand, ready to render any service. They are an industrious, economical, God-fearing people, and will beyond all doubt prove to be a very desirable acquisition to the population of their adopted State. Frugality is universal. They live on far less than the most economical Americans. They know nothing but the hardest work and the simplest living. Their homes are generally rudely furnished, but have an air of neatness and comfort. They are an honest, industrious, frugal, high-spirited, simple-minded folk, with no bad habits and with every disposition to make their own way in the world.

A GROUP OF WALDENSIAN MATRONS.

Hospitality is a prevalent virtue. They welcome you to their homes with the utmost cordiality, and cheerfully share with you the best the larder will afford. They esteem it a slight if you will not accept the universally proffered cup of tea. They are a moral, law-abiding people. They cherish a high sense of honor. They expect those with whom they deal to be equally honorable, and a breach excites in them the greatest indignation.

A hosiery-factory has been established at Valdese, which gives employment to many of the young people of the colony. A saw-mill likewise affords employment to many at such times as can be spared from the home and farm. Their crops the last year were not good. Several causes combined to bring about this result: a late frost, a protracted drought in the early summer, lack of information in regard to methods of successful farming in this country, and the fact that they are as yet unused to our tools and farming implements. The spade and the hoe are familiar implements, but not the plow and the reaper. Possibly the colonists are themselves in part to blame. They do not always take kindly to suggestions which imply that other methods are better than their own. Indeed this is natural, for the training of many centuries has made them a stubborn, intractable people.

They have their own local pastor who lives at Valdese, the Rev. Barth Soulier. He is a young man of genial spirit, friendly manners, well educated, and speaks English with fluency. He and his excellent wife, also well educated, crossed the Atlantic on their bridal tour, he to begin life in the pastoral charge of the colony in America, and she to be a devoted help-meet to the young missionary. They find constant employment in ministering to the spiritual interests of the flock.

The doctrinal creed of the Waldensians, as would be inferred from the membership of the Vaudois church in the alliance of the Reformed churches, of which mention has already been made, is substantially that of the Presbyterian Church in the United States and their forms of worship resemble ours in their apostolic simplicity. No one would observe any difference hardly that would excite attention. Their ordinary Sabbath worship consists simply in prayer and praise, in reading God's Word and preaching. They practice infant baptism, and lay great stress upon the children's birth-right privilege. They are rigid in the observance of the duties of family religion. The children, even the very little ones, are faithfully instructed in the Scriptures. Both the doctrinal teachings of the Word are inculcated, and the very words of Holy Writ are committed to memory. It will be remembered that it is said that in the days of their persecutions every child was taught to memorize thoroughly some portion of the Scriptures, so that if the sacred texts were entirely destroyed it might be reproduced from memory. It is this love for the Word of God, inherited from their fathers, which manifests itself so conspicuously. The children are taught to carry with them a copy of the French Testament to read while watching the cows in the pasture. The church is governed by a bench of Elders who, together with the pastor, constitute the "consistory."

The Colony has recently been set apart into a "school district" under the laws of the State, and an appropriation has been made of the public school fund for the support of their schools. The law requires that the pupils of these schools shall be taught English. These people are generally poor. They have come hither to better their worldly condition. They are worthy of the sympathy and encouragement of the people among whom they have cast their lot, a claim which has not been unrecognized. They have received from everyone with whom they have been brought into contact a cordial and whole-souled welcome. They seem contented and happy. The mountain scenery of Western North Carolina suffices to satisfy their inborn predilection for "rising ground," while the balminess of the climate possesses an attraction that even their native Alpine district cannot offer. The future for them and their children is encouraging and full of hope. They are planning the building of a church adequate to accommodate their present numbers and their growing families.

Cavalier Matteo Prochet, D. D., a famous leader among the Waldensians of Italy, the pastor of a Waldensian church in the city of Rome, known perhaps to some of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, visited the Colony last winter and rendered them substantial help in the organization of the Colony and the settlement of many perplexing problems. The pastor of these people in their home in Italy, Rev. C. A. Trou, in a letter to the author of this sketch writes: "Everyone here is following this stream of emigration with great anxiety and prayer. Oh, may God bless this effort, this colony among Protestants. Help, direct and pray for my dear Waldenses."

JOHN M. ROSE, JR.

A CHINESE COLONEL.

Among the Chinese soldiery now prisoners of war in Japan Christian missionaries are busily circulating New Testaments and religious literature and are holding conversations with all who may desire teaching. Rev. H. Loomis, the agent of the American Bible Society in Japan, has been specially active. He writes: One of the prisoners in Hiroshima with whom we talked, was a Chinese Colonel, a bright, fine-looking man. Someone had already given him a copy of the New Testament, and he had read nearly one half of it. He expressed by his actions, as well as by his words, that he was deeply grateful for the gift, and said that he believed much of it. He will also tell his companions what he has learned. He had heard something of Christianity from the missionaries in China, but it had never come to him so impressively before. On his sleeve, as on all others, was the badge of the Red Cross Society. When he was asked if he knew the meaning of that emblem he replied that he did, and that Christianity was the origin of the care and comfort which they received.

These men come from various provinces, and when they go home will tell that, instead of torture and death at the hands of their foes, they had experienced nothing but kindness and attention.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 17. Luke 10: 25-37. Golden Text Lev. 19: 18. By Mrs. Baxter.

IN the course of his teaching there came to Jesus one day a lawyer, a doctor of laws, as we should call him, but of laws which were inspired of God. This man stood up and tempted him, or proved him, saying, "Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" How little that man knew into what close quarters he was coming with him who is himself eternal life! There stood eternal life in its embodiment and deepest source, and the man who came with his enquiries after eternal life was seeking in something he himself could do, something which should proceed from himself, that eternal life which is to know the only true God, and he whom he hath sent, even Jesus Christ!

Jesus took him on his own ground, that of doing: "What is written in the law? How readest thou? Two very different questions: "What is written," the unfathomable truth of God on the one hand, and man's acquaintance with it. "How readest thou?" on the other. And he answering, said, "Thou shalt love." This man was not without understanding of Divine things: intellectually he was far beyond some of his compeers, who tithed mint and anise and cummin, and left undone the weightier matters of the law, judgment, and mercy and faith." (Matt. 23: 23, R.V.) The doctrine of this man was sound and Scriptural, but it had yet to be put to the test. He had spoken in Scriptural language: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."(Deut. 6: 5.) Love is the fulfilling of the law. "Thou hast answered right" was the Lord's rejoinder in language as Scriptural as his own, headed

"This do, and Thou Shalt Live."

Most of the old classical systems of heathen religion teach precepts which enjoin a life of love, but the problem to the honest enquirer among the heathen is the same as that which meets the Christian who is still under the law. In his conflict he cries out: "In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not." I ought to love God with all my heart, soul, mind, and strength; I ought to love my neighbor as myself; but I find in my heart a distrust of God, and a depreciation of my fellow-man, and all my efforts to love prove useless, I cannot do the things that I would.

The more intelligent followers of Buddha loathe and fret against their own inherent and contemptible selfishness by nature; they despise themselves, but they cannot conquer themselves, and their highest idea of happiness and holiness is in a kind of moral annihilation, a condition of deadness to all emotion, all love, all hope, all aspirations, an escape from suffering by moral suicide. The papist also, knowing that he cannot attain the holy life which is his ideal, hands over his conscience and his responsibility to the keeping of another, a fellow-sinner, though a priest, and tries to avoid the personal responsibility which he has thus shelved. The unsatisfied face of the Mohammedan shows that his constant cry: "Allah is great, Allah is good," and his fatalistic abandonment of all his responsibility to Allah has not brought him [illegible] "I ought to thirst and love God. I ought to be of use to my [illegible]"

This Jewish doctor of the law, like many [illegible] strengthen his position, and justify himself. To escape from his dilemma, he asked the question, which, perhaps he thought Jesus would not attempt to answer: "And

Who is My Neighbor?"

Who can prove his claim upon my love? Where is limit to the number that I am bound to love as I love myself? My power of love is so restrained that I must know how far it has to reach out, and what demands can be justly made upon it. It is a critical moment when, for the first time in his life, a man who is still self-centred, who has up to that moment looked upon all things and all persons in the light of how far they pleased and ministered to him—becomes aware of the fact by the light of the Spirit of God, that he is not his own, and that his life has been one great terrible mistake. It causes a revolution in a man's life when, instead of his old habit of considering how people ought to treat him, and what is due from them to him, he comes to see that true kingship is "not to be ministered unto, but to minister," that the true computation in the light of Christ, and of his Word, is not how much is due to me from others, but how much will God accept from me, and how much may I have the privilege by love to serve others?

When from the highest heaven the Son of God came down to earth, he did not ask the question: "How many of these fallen creatures am I bound to help?" There was a holy oneness between the Father and the Son when "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.) And the deep love breathed out from the heart of Jesus to the cold calculating man at his side when he answered him by the story of the good Samaritan, the very picture of his own position at that and at every other moment of his career among men. "A certain man"—he may not have been a Pharisee, he may not have been in any way a noted man, there was nothing mentioned which should distinguish him from the ordinary run of men—"was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho,"—an ordinary journey—"and he fell among robbers, which both stripped him and beat him and departed leaving him half dead" (R.V.) If he had been a priest, his position would entitle him to the first consideration; if an elder, a prince, a very rich man or a public benefactor, he could claim or command assistance. But

"A Certain Man."

He might have been somebody's servant, he may have been only a day laborer—whose neighbor was he? On whom was it incumbent to care for such an one? A priest passed by; it was none of his business: a Levite followed; his vocation was to trade, not to nurse the sick. He looked at him, saw that he was nobody particular, and passed by, too. "But a certain Samaritan,"—also a man who was not prominent enough to be described in any way—"came where he was, and when he saw him he was moved with compassion, and came to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring on them oil and wine; and he sat him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him." (R.V.) What was there in the certain man which attracted the Samaritan? What was the special claim which he had upon him, and how could he have proved he was his neighbor? He had only his need to prove his claim, but that was enough.

Jesus Christ, our Lord, has made every man his neighbor. In the deepest sense, it can be said of every human being; Jesus "came where he was;" under the curse, under the condemnation of the disgrace of his sin. Jesus was "made a curse for us," "made sin for us," and he has loved his neighbor as himself, yet above himself. We count our neighbor to be he who is near to us, who lives next door, in the same street, on the next farm, or closely connected with us in business, or in our church or family relations. Where can we find a neighbor nearer than he who has shared the same condemnation, who has awaited execution in the same prison-cell? Thus near to us is every son of man. We cannot say that at the antipodes, men in New Zealand and Australia are not our neighbors because their bodily presence is on the other side the world. Christ died for them, and in his death they died, they were crucified even as we. (II. Cor. 5: 14; Rom. 6: 6.) In the light of Christ we are silenced by his very Cross in raising the question: Who is my neighbor? the great question which forces itself with tremendous vigor upon us is this: Who is not my neighor?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SNARES were set for Jesus during the whole course of his ministry by the recognized religious teachers of the day. The question of the lawyer appears to have been one of them. Unlike the lawyers of our day, he was a religious teacher, the law he had studied being the law of the Pentateuch. He probably hoped that Jesus would give him an answer opposed to the law. Jesus skilfully parries the attack by asking another question, which the lawyer answers by a quotation from the book of Deuteronomy. The lawyer feeling himself foiled, and willing to justify himself, that is, extricate himself from his failure, asks, Who is my neighbor? Jesus replies by the Parable of the lesson. It should be noticed that Jesus changed the standpoint of the lawyer's question by his parable. The lawyer wanted to know who the people were whom he was to love as himself; Jesus does not indicate them, but raises the question of whom he is willing to love. He shows him that he is not to pick and discriminate, but be a neighborly man, a man whose love would go out to anyone in need. Was the wounded man a neighbor to the priest, the Levite or the Samaritan? Jesus does not say. The question was who was a neighbor to him. The man might be a stranger, he might have been imprudent, he might even have been a wicked man; the Samaritan, whose example the lawyer is to follow, does not stay to inquire. The man is in need of help and he helps him. He does not consider himself, but uses his oil and wine, puts him on his own beast, takes him to the inn, waits upon him and when he can do no more, pays the landlord two pence, or dinars, worth about thirty cents, which at that time was sufficient to hire a man to work two days, equivalent to three dollars now, so that his protege was sure of attendance till he recovered. The man who would do that, was the man the Saviour commended. So when we hear the talk about people not being worthy of help, of their having brought their troubles on themselves, of their being no relation to us, of it being no concern of onrs how they live or starve—we may be sure that we are listening to unchristian talk. If we see anyone needing help, which we can give, we may think of what the Samaritan did and hear our Lord say, "Go thou and do likewise."

AN ORIENTAL INN BETWEEN JERUSALEM AND JERICHO.

What shall I do to inherit eternal life? A similar question was asked long ago in pagan Rome. An ardent young man went to Hermas and asked him what sacrifice would be acceptable to God, what he should offer to show his gratitude and love. Hermas took the noble young fellow and showed him something of the sin of Rome, and he pointed out here and there something the need of its souls, he said, "Here you will find an altar and there become the sacrifice!" The same advice may still be given to any earnest young Christian: Look upon the millions who are without Christ in the world in their awful sin, and you will find an altar; and may God help you to be a sacrifice.

He had compassion on him. Perhaps we might wait all our lives for an opportunity to succor a man who had been wounded and robbed; but we need not wait a day for an opportunity to do what Christ was suggesting when he told the story of the Good Samaritan. A popular writer says: "Walking before me was a young girl very handsomely dressed. I thought: 'I wonder if she takes half as much pains with her heart as she does with her person.' A poor old man was coming toward us wheeling a loaded wheel-barrow. Just before he reached us he turned and tried to wheel his load into the yard of a house. But the gate was heavy and it would swing shut before he could get the barrow through. 'Wait,' cried the young girl, springing lightly forward; 'I'll hold the gate open.' She smiled and received his thanks with a pleased smile. 'She deserves to have beautiful clothes,' I thought, 'for a beautiful spirit dwells in her breast.'"

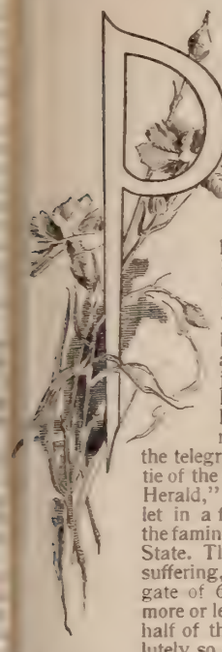
Pouring in oil and wine. A common mode of dealing with contusions and abrasions in ancient times. There are some wounds that require one kind of treatment and some another. Here is a kind that a child found effectual. "There is a little girl in our class," she said to her mother on her return from school, "who is in dreadful trouble. Her mother is dead and she was at school to-day for the first time since the funeral. At recess, she could not play, she just sat down and put her head on her desk and cried." Her mother saw tears and sympathy in the child's eyes and asked, "What did my little daughter do?" The child looked up wonderingly, saying, "What could I do, mamma? I could not comfort her, you know. You can't comfort any one whose mamma is dead. It's too bad to talk about. I could not help crying, and when I saw her, and I sat by her and cried quietly. And she put her arms around my neck and kissed me, and said I had done her so much good. What did she mean, mamma?"

Which was neighbor unto him? "I was sitting at my window;" writes a lad, "Two or three persons passed and I noticed that they all slipped and some nearly fell at one place. I think the boys must have been sliding there. When anyone slipped they all laughed and I was sorry to hear them. Now a little girl came by with a basket heavily laden I judged by the way she walked. On the top were a number of buttons, spools, tapes and such things. Down she went, her basket falling on its side and all the contents rolling out. Through the window I could hear the boys laughing. But the door of the house opposite opened quickly, and a little boy ran out bare-headed and without overcoat. He crossed the road and I saw him picking up the girl's things and putting them in her basket. Her hands were so stiff and cold she could not pick them up herself. "That boy," said I, "is a little knight. If he had seen the wounded man on the Jericho road, he would have done as the good Samaritan did."

Go and do thou likewise. Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, formerly pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, relates a family reminiscence which illustrates the lesson. His grandfather was a farmer in a mountain district of Scotland. One day, a boy was going to the mill with a sack of wheat which, according to the custom in that region, was thrown across a horse's back. the horse stumbled and the sack slipped off. The farmer tried in vain to lift it back. A man approached on horseback, and Taylor resolved to ask his help, but when he came nearer Taylor recognized him as the lord who lived in the great castle of the county, far too great a man to be asked for such a service. But the Lord did not wait to be asked. He dismounted and helped to put the sack back in its place. Taylor was profuse in his thanks. "Say no more," said his lordship. "I will tell you how you can pay for my help. Whenever you see a man needing a helping hand as badly as you did just now, just you go to his assistance." So saying he rode away.

FIGHTING BACK THE FAMINE.

Nebraska Grateful for the Aid Extended by "The Christian Herald" Relief Fund—Governor Holcomb, Through Dr. Klopsch, Thanks the Benevolent East—Fears that the Worst Suffering is Yet to Come—The Distress Universally Admitted.



PAINFUL as is the revelation, the investigation now being conducted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in connection with the distress in the West and especially in Nebraska, has abundantly justified the fear that the worst has not yet been told. Letters and despatches just received from Dr. Louis Klopsch, in Nebraska, as well as the telegram of Mr. Peattie of the Omaha "World-Herald," published below, let in a flood of light on the famine situation in that State. Thirty-six counties suffering, and an aggregate of 60,000 persons more or less destitute, one-half of that number absolutely so and the remainder almost certain to become destitute ere winter passes, such is the situation concisely stated. All attempts to conceal the true condition of affairs have proved futile. Much remains to be done, and although the gifts of clothing and similar articles would now seem to be sufficient for all needs, the food supply provided is barely enough to avert the impending and graver danger for a very limited time.

Gov. Holcomb thanks the East.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, accompanied by Mrs. Klopsch and also by Rev. George W. Sharpe, Sunday School Missionary, had a most cheering interview with Gov. Holcomb of Nebraska, in the Capitol at Lincoln. Rev. Luther P. Ludden, Manager of the State Relief Commission, was also present. The State Legislature, that same afternoon, passed a bill appropriating $50,000 for the purchase of seed for the farmers in the drouth-stricken counties and for the payment of freight charges. Moreover, another important relief measure was under discussion, viz.: a bill to empower the stricken counties to issue bonds for the relief of the suffering people. But even if this measure had been immediately passed, thirty days, at least, must necessarily elapse before any action could be taken in the direction of practical relief and, meantime, the lives of man and beast must be sustained.

Governor Holcomb expressed profound gratitude for all that had been done for the relief of the sufferers in his State. He explained that, but for the constitutional provision prohibiting the increase of the public debt beyond the $100,000 already incurred, legislative appropriations would have afforded the necessary relief ere now. He hoped the people of the country at large would understand the limitations to Nebraska's good intentions which were thus constitutionally imposed. The suffering, he admitted, was intense; but thanks to generous people everywhere, relief had been afforded. Still, much remained to be done. He was grateful to a kind Providence for the mild weather and hoped it would continue. Before the interview closed, Governor Holcomb desired Dr. Klopsch to express to the people of the East, his heartfelt and sincere gratitude for all their kindness and practical sympathy in this time of widespread and intense destitution.

Dr. Klopsch's Mission of Relief.

Before leaving Lincoln, on his tour of investigation through the State of Nebraska, Dr. Klopsch telegraphed as follows:

LINCOLN, Neb., Jan. 28:—I have interviewed Mr. Mason, President of the State Relief Committee, Mr. Ludden, General Manager, Governor Holcomb, Senate Chaplain McTeal, Church Howe, Commander of the G. A. R., Bishop Newman, Presiding Elder Hale, of the Holdredge District, the Omaha "World-Herald," Omaha "Bee," and many State Senators and judges, and I am fully satisfied that the Nebraska farmers, notwithstanding very generous contributions, will suffer further and more general impoverishment, and that, before harvest time, 100,000 at least will have reached a very desperate condition.

Just at this time, the plethora of supplies, especially of clothing, has developed the impression that the enemy has been conquered and the victory achieved. I believe the worst is yet to come. The railroads will no longer carry free the supplies which, in a month or two, will be needed more than ever. An army of thirty thousand consumes a vast quantity of stuff, and what now seems such an abundance will then be found to have been utterly inadequate. There can be no harvest until July, and unless they eat the seed given for sowing, many will have to starve; and if they do eat it, there will be no crop for them and they will be worse off than ever.

The Plan of Distribution.

However, I am going through the States of Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado. I am just preparing for myself and Mr. Sharp the following circular to our distributors and other relief agents. We will board cars on the arrival of the train and discuss matter en route until the next station, when they must make room for the local committee of that place. Mr. Sharp takes one route and I another. Every now and then we will stop over to make personal investigations. This is the circular:

DEAR FRIEND:—The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, having generously provided a liberal fund for the relief of the Western drouth sufferers, I am now in Nebraska on a tour of investigation, in order to correctly ascertain the actual needs of the families rendered destitute by reason of the crop failures. Should the condition of your district call urgently for immediate assistance, will you, and the head of your organized relief committee the pastor of your church and the leading officers of your town, please take notice that on the ——I shall be a passenger on the west-bound Block Island train number ——, and on board of which I would be pleased to meet a small committee, who can make it convenient to travel to the next station and communicate en route whatever report they may choose to make, in relation to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief movement. Should this for any reason, prove impracticable, a detailed report in writing may be submitted and handed the conductor of the train and will receive prompt and careful consideration. Please have the report properly authenticated and state distinctly how many families are destitute and who is duly authorized to receive contributions for distribution among the needy. If no relief should be required, a line from you to that effect would be very helpful to me in fixing the extent of the suffering. Thanking you in advance for your kind offices in the matter, I am very faithfully yours, LOUIS KLOPSCH.

If this is as generally responded to as I have every reason to believe it will be, I shall be in possession of such facts as will admit of almost infallible conclusions. In the meantime, I am in daily receipt of letters from persons who have read of our arrival, begging of us, many of them piteously, to give their neighborhood prompt and favorable consideration. Especially do appeals come from Kansas and Colorado, insisting on their claim to equal attention with Nebraska. After Kansas, we go into Colorado pursuing the same plan and endeavoring also to reach out to South Dakota and Oklahoma.

Appropriations From the Relief Fund.

Mr. Sharp will meet the five car-loads of clothing and supplies sent from our Central Relief Depot in New York last week, and with $1,000 in cash, will personally visit writers of the most important appeals from Kansas.

Thus far the following appropriations have been made:

From THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, previously sent to 270 distributors, ...	$5000 00
Relief for G. A. R., ...	1000 00
Nebraska State Relief Commission, ...	5000 00
World-Herald, Omaha, . . .	1000 00
Coffee, tea, and sugar for aged and invalid sufferers, . . .	500 00
Rev. Huntington's Relief Com.	1000 00
Total for Nebraska, ...	$13500 00

The State Relief Committee has unanimously voted to give me the direction of the distribution of these appropriations, and I have given them the names of our Volunteer Distributors, and of the pastors of churches to whom to give preference. In a few days I will be able to fix the appropriations for Kansas, Colorado, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Northern Texas.

I have spent an hour at the Omaha "World-Herald" office, and another hour with Editor Rosewater, of the Omaha "Bee." The latter readily admits there is much suffering in the State, but he thinks it unwise to give undue prominence to the subject. This is the first time in thirty years that the entire State has suffered a total failure of crops; the eastern tier of counties can bear the loss without much trouble.

The Truth No Longer Concealed.

The central tier, inhabited by people who have been there three or four years, have been pretty badly hurt; but with little assistance can pull through. The western tier, consisting principally of lands which have heretofore been considered of little value except for grazing and which have never been operated with much success, is worse off, as three or four crop failures in succession have occurred. Mr. Rosewater believes that they are suffering terribly. The railroad and land interests in the State, of course, endeavor to make little of the trouble, but it does exist, and Mr. Rosewater believes, with me, that the tightest pinch will come in three or four months from now. This is a valuable admission, inasmuch as it establishes the fact that the "Bee's" attitude in relation to the suffering was principally influenced by a desire to protect the fair name of the State

LOUIS KLOPSCH.

Thirty-six counties in Nebraska are affected, a very large number of the families being entirely destitute, while probably as many more badly require assistance. It is a reasonable estimate that 30,000 people are entirely destitute and as many more will need help through the winter—altogether 60,000!

Editor Peattie on the Distress.

OMAHA, NEB., Jan. 28. To-night Dr. Louis Klopsch leaves the State after a stay of nearly a week, arranging for the distribution of the magnificent gift of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The prayers and thanks of a grateful people follow him on his errand of mercy.

The situation in this State cannot be exaggerated. In spite of the protests of certain newspapers and the denunciations of real estate speculators and others who are trying to float county bonds of one kind or another, the truth has been told otherwise the real condition of the people in certain Nebraska counties would be unknown to-day.

The writer of the dispatch made a trip through the famine drought-stricken region or a part of it just previous to Christmas, traveling about two thousand miles by rail and about four hundred by wagon. He personally visited thirteen counties and interviewed many hundred persons. The information which he has gained from personal contact with the people themselves in their own homes; with ministers whose duty requires them to travel over vast tracts of country and with county officers, who were personally conversant with the fact.

As a result of this investigation, and the publication of the truth, supplies are pouring in on every hand. If proper care is used in the distribution, no one will need to suffer for the necessities of life. Nothing, however, but a personal supervision of the work by intelligent and well-posted agents will suffice, for in many cases the really needy will never apply for relief

"The Christian Herald's" Plan Approved.

They will have to be sought out and their wants looked into and if the munificence of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is only distributed according to the directions of Mr. Klopsch, the efforts of that gentleman will keep off the grim spectre of want, until the people can begin to take care of themselves. They are a magnificent lot of people, these Nebraska farmers. They are self-respecting American citizens, who have given of their substance to their neighbors, and their life's blood to their nation, and what is given them now, you may be sure will return with interest some day to the givers.

Causes of the Suffering.

It is a bleak, wind-swept county for the most part, and in sharp contrast to the well-watered and wooded lands of the East, from whence many of these people came. They were driven out, most of them, by excessive taxation or worn-out land, and have cast their fortunes on these prairies, attracted thereto by the low price of farm lands, and the freedom and sweep of the West. When the problem of irrigating this country shall have been solved, there will be no richer farming sections in the Union, and when that time comes, the people, if sustained at present, will reap the benefit.

Meanwhile, two successive failures of crops have reduced a large proportion of the people to the verge of beggary. Up to July 26, the corn crop of 1894 promised to be one of the most bountiful in the history of the State. Then, after a long, rainless period, came three days of the awful hot winds. This blast—like the breath of a furnace—withered the entire vegetation of the State. Farmers looked out the next day at the ruin of their entire crop and prepared to face starvation, for few had saved anything from the scant yield of the previous year. One by one, they sacrificed their coins. Their chickens and hogs died for want of feed. Day after day they watched their larder growing less and less. Then, as autumn and finally winter, came on, the pinch of want was felt. To-day the farmer of Western Nebraska sits shivering over a miserable blaze of cow chips, wondering how long it will be before gaunt starvation will claim him for its own.

Plea for the Children.

In some counties, the numbers of the destitute reach as high as twenty-five hundred and three thousand, and in Keith county, there are over six hundred little children in families applying for aid. The writer has seen women clothed only in torn calico wrappers and little tots, barefooted, and in a single garment, running over the stubble in the sharp December wind to herd the one remaining cow or horse. In Keith county, the other day, a woman, finding that she was about to bring into the world another child to face famine, cut her throat and her husband followed her example.

A letter from Frontier county, says:

We don't want to go out of the county, but I guess we will have to, or starve. We have not a thimbleful of grease in the house. There are eight of us in the family. * * * We had one hundred acres of crops in last year, and did not get a grain of anything. We lost our team, and have only a pony team. We have some hay, but no grain to feed them on. George the husband) cannot get work anywhere. We have very little bed-clothing or clothes.

Nebraska itself has done what it could to take care of its own, but the truth is that the whole State has suffered, although not in such a degree as experienced in the western portion. The gifts of good, kind Eastern people have been timely and Nebraska returns to the donors, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its heartfelt thanks.

R. B. PEATTIE.

No More Clothing Needed.

Both in Kansas and Nebraska, the urgent needs of the destitute, as far as clothing is concerned, seem to have been generously supplied, and no more contributions of that character are now needed. Our Central Relief Station, at 15 Bible House, has therefore been instructed to receive no further gifts of clothing and supplies. A very large shipment was made last week by express.

Owing to limited space, the publication of many reports of our Volunteer Distributors in both Nebraska and Kansas is deferred till next week. The money contributions to the Relief Fund are acknowledged on the next page, and the gifts of clothing, etc., on page 89 of this issue.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

MADAGASCAR IN PERIL.

WITH the opening of the spring, the Queen and people of Madagascar expect the arrival of the French expedition which has been equipped for their subjugation. That it is dreaded there is no doubt. The people are poor and their armaments are antiquated. They are unused to fighting, and are but few in number compared with the army that France is preparing to send against them. Yet they were too brave to yield to the insolent demand of their enemies, and are making what preparations they can to resist the invader. The little army has been drilled by Gen. Willoughby, an English officer, and another English General—General Shervington—has also recently cast his lot with them. They have but few guns, and those badly mounted. The accompanying picture of the battery at Ambodinandohalo shows the character of their forts. The real defense of the country, however, will be the natural difficulties it presents to the march of a European army. The dense forests, the rugged mountain ranges, and the wide rivers, to which there are few bridges, are obstacles that the invaders are likely to find even more serious than fortifications. A few troops, who know the country, and take advantage of its natural fastnesses may be able to harass a hostile army, and perhaps effectually bar its progress. It is certain that all that the native troops can do will be done, for they are enthusiastic in their loyalty, and have a wholesome hatred of the French. They have seen something of what French rule implies, in the northwest part of the island, and they prefer death to submission. To human reason it seems impossible that the brave and pious people can be saved from their unscrupulous enemies, but history records many instances of God interposing to bring to naught the designs of wicked rulers, and it may yet be that the prayers of the Godly Queen and her people, and their friends, the missionaries, will be heard. They are putting their trust in One who in olden time in a similar crisis delivered a king who prayed: "We have no might against this great company that cometh against us: neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon thee." (II Chron. 20: 12.)

THE FRENCH INVASION OF MADAGASCAR—NATIVE BATTERY AT AMBODINANDOHALO.

An Illogical Verdict.

When jurymen cannot agree, they occasionally make a compromise which satisfids neither party to the dispute. One such case was tried by Judge Pryor, in New York, last week. It was brought against an ice company by a man whose son had been run over and killed by a wagon belonging to the company. The father claimed damages which the company objected to pay, on the ground that the killing was a pure accident, the boy who was playing in the roadway, having run under the horses' feet before it was possible for the driver to check them. The jury after a long consultation awarded the father fifty dollars. Judge Pryor promptly acceded to the request of the father's counsel for a new trial. He said: "If the jury had found a verdict for the defendant, I should not have disturbed it, because the question of responsibility was pretty evenly balanced; but having found for the plaintiff and having assessed the value of the life of this boy at fifty dollars—the price, about, of a poodle dog—I think the verdict should be set aside. I cannot imagine that the value of the life of such a son to such a father is only fifty dollars. I infer that there is no father on that jury who would consider that the value of his son." All parents will agree with the judge, but, unhappily, they do not always act as if they knew how much their children are worth. If they did rightly appreciate the value of a child's soul they would be more careful as to the example they set and the training they give. (Prov. 22: 6.)

An Unrecognized Brother.

An unexpected family reunion took place at Southampton, L. I., a few days ago. A married lady who lives there received a visit from her brother who lives in Brooklyn. During his stay she introduced him to several of her friends. One of them, on hearing his name, remarked that he had an acquaintance of that name and asked if he was a relative. The young man replied that he did not know of any relative living in Southampton besides his sister, but said that he would like to see his namesake. A meeting was arranged and it was found that the two were brothers. They were separated twenty years ago when their parents died. The three children being unprovided for, had been adopted by different families and had lost trace of each other. About two years ago the family which had adopted the youngest boy removed from Ohio to Southampton and he accompanied them. His sister has been living there since her marriage five years ago and must have seen her brother numberless times on the village street without recognizing him. She will never do so again. Although he is practically a stranger to her, the discovery that he is her brother will secure him at least a kindly greeting from her and a sisterly interest in his welfare. It should always be so with every follower of Christ. To him the man who loves the same Lord should never be a stranger, but be treated as a brother. (Philemon 16.)

Lives Lost in the Storm.

A sad story of loss of life comes from New London, Conn. A powerful tug took refuge in that port on Jan. 26, which had lost all its convoy of five barges on the night before. It left New York on Jan. 23, with its tow of coal-laden barges on each of which were several persons, fourteen in all. The weather was fine until Point Judith was reached, shortly before midnight of Jan. 25. There the wind freshened and was soon blowing fiercely from the East. A blinding snow-storm also came on, so that the captain of the tug could scarcely see the lights on the barges behind him. Being afraid that he would be driven on shore, he headed eastward in the teeth of the storm. For two hours the sturdy tug pulled at its long tow, the gale increasing in violence. Then there came a violent strain on the hawser and it parted, the three stern barges drifting away. From the tug they could be seen violently swaying before the heavy sea that was running and then the lights went out in the darkness and the captain believes that they went down. A few minutes afterward the two remaining barges were engulfed by a huge wave and sank, the hawser breaking as they foundered. The tug flung out life-preservers attached by ropes and two men were saved by this means, but all the others, eight men and four women must have perished. The captain of the tug, bronzed sailor as he was, shed tears as he told of the distress with which he saw the people on his convoy drifting to destruction, while he was powerless to save them. He said it was one of the worst storms he had ever been in. The tug had much ado to save itself and could do nothing for the barges it was towing. The Christian in the storms of life sometimes fears that he will be overwhelmed, but there is no danger while he is linked to his divine Leader by a bond that even death itself cannot sever. (Rom. 8: 38, 39.)

Bats in a Church.

The sexton of an old church at Riverdale says that he has witnessed several strange encounters in the unused basement of the edifice. A number of bats have made it their home, and as the windows are seldom closed in the summer, they fly in and out on their nightly excursions, while in the winter they are content to remain within. Last winter a new furnace-man got rid of the entire colony for several weeks by the simple plan of leaving the windows open till midnight and then closing them and keeping them closed. The bats flew out in the evening on their usual nocturnal journeys, and, when they returned after midnight, they found their entrance closed. They flapped at the windows for some time, but finally sought some other home. Since then, the windows having been left open through the summer, they have returned to their old quarters in the church basement. They find enough food to support life in the mice which infest the building. They hang head downward, suspended by the hooks at the joints of their wings and remain motionless for hours. They look as if they were asleep, but they are simply watching. Suddenly they swoop down upon a mouse, or even a small rat. There is a squeal and a great flapping of wings in the semi-darkness, and after a struggle the mouse is killed. Then there is often a fight between two or more bats for the largest part of the prey. If any bat is wounded or in any way incapacitated for taking care of itself, the other bats fall upon it and kill and eat it. The bats simply act according to their nature in the church as they would elsewhere. But it ought not to be so with the men who frequent the edifice. However cruel and rapacious they may be by nature the effect of what they hear there should be manifest in gentleness of heart and life. There is, besides, Apostolic warning against people "who bite and devour one another." (Gal. 5: 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

At a Meeting in the Interest of Sunday School work in the Marble Collegiate Church, New York, a few days ago, Mr. B. F. Jacobs said that there were in New York State nearly seven hundred thousand children growing up without religious training.

The Report of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions shows that the Board has twenty distinct fields of labor having an aggregate population of one hundred millions. It has 571 missionaries, nearly three thousand native helpers, and maintains twelve hundred Schools, seminaries and colleges.

The Old South Church at Boston, Mass., recently celebrated its 225th anniversary. That it has not suffered from senility is evident from the fact that its contributions to missions l st year amounted to $16,267. $7,500 went to Foreign Missions; $3,900 to Home Missions; and $4,887 to City missions.

The Municipality of Rome has accepted the the gift of a bust of Alexander Gavazzi, the famous Italian patriot and orator. This will be a fresh grievance for the Pope, who reckons Gavazzi his uncompromising foe.

Rev. Thomas Harrison's meetings at Bridgeton, N. J., are exerting an influence far and wide in the State. Other towns in Southern New Jersey have been moved and it is hoped that revivals will be started at many centres.

A Revival Continuing eight weeks is reported from Cornwall, Vt. It commenced in a house to house visitation, then meetings in suburban schoolhouses and finally in the churches. The leaders are three lady-evangelists, Mrs. Pratt and Misses Pickering and Freeman

Dr. George F. Pentecost makes the statement in his Church paper that money spent by men and women of his congregation in wines spirits, beer and tobacco would be almost, if not entirely sufficient to defray all the expenses of the Church. The church in question is the Marylebone Presbyterian Church, London.

A Union Evangelistic movement in Denver, Colo., was commenced on Jan. 28 under the leadership of Rev. F. E. Smiley. The plan of campaign as outlined by Mr. Smiley consists of dividing the city into seven districts. All the churches in a given district, after holding separate preparatory services in their respective churches, will unite in the most central and commodious church for union meeting for at least one week.

The Churches of Madison, Wis., have United in the work of municipal reform. Their first effort is for the better observance of the Lord's Day. The closing of saloons and gambling houses on that day is enjoined by law and the churches are compelling the enforcement of the statute.

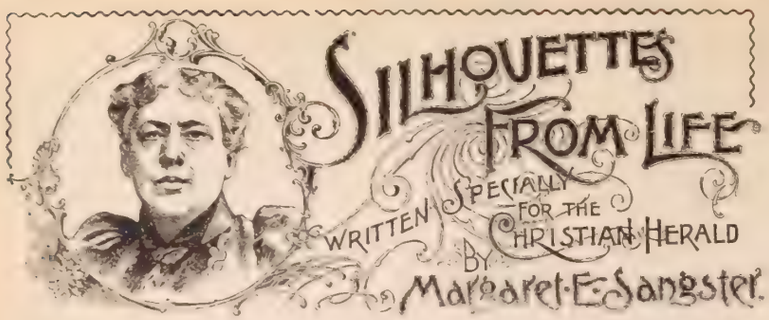
A Meeting was Held in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, on Jan. 24, at which it was decided to send a memorial to Congress in reference to the project of celebrating the beginning of the Twentieth Century by erecting a temple "In honor of Christ" in Jerusalem.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's Services in the First Presbyterian Church, Jersey City, N. J., have attracted enormous audiences. Four churches co-operated in the work and each is enjoying a great outpouring of the Spirit. The crowds were so large on Jan. 20 that an overflow meeting was necessary and Prof. Birch, who is asssisting Dr. Munhall, took charge of it. The number of seekers includes several prominent people.

The Suggestion of the "Reform Mayor" of New York City, that a change of the law should be made by which the saloons might be opened during specified hours on Sunday is arousing decided opposition. The New York Presbytery has passed a resolution strongly deprecating the change. A similar resolution was passed at a meeting held in the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church by a union meeting of ministers representing the Presbyterian, Congregational and Reformed Churches of the city.

Recent Statistics as to the Public Libraries of the United States show that Massachusetts ranks first with 212 free public libraries with a total of 2,700,000 volumes, or 1233 volumes to every 1000 of the State's population. New Hampshire comes next with 42 libraries and 175,000 books, or 464 volumes to every 1000 of population. Illinois ranks third, having 42 libraries, or 130 volumes to each 1000 of the population.

Mrs. David Jamal is very Grateful for the help our readers have rendered, in her efforts for the poor girls of Jerusalem. She writes: "My tongue and my pen cannot express our hearty gratitude for the interest the kind Christian ladies are taking in my class. I beg you to be good enough to thank them in my name, and in behalf of the class, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for their comforting words and their contributions. I humbly hope that by God's mercy and the aid of these good friends, the class will continue to grow and flourish as the mustard seed which our Lord spoke of."



The Little Milliner.

DURING the week of prayer, there were meetings of the greatest interest in the churches of Locust Dale. Three churches, Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian held union services every evening, and, alternating in their different edifices, were thronged by rapt and earnest congregations. Never were prayers more fervent, never was singing sweeter, never was there shown a lovelier devotional spirit, than in these delightful meetings, which rich and poor, learned and ignorant, old and young, sought with ardor and enjoyed with zest and enthusiasm.

The little milliner who went out to work by the day, just as dressmakers have from our earliest recollection, felt her soul quickened and her piety revived by the genuinely spiritual meetings. Tired as she usually was when after a day of hard work, trimming and lining and spangling and wiring and shaping, making over old hats, and evolving new ones which her customers pronounced "loves" and "dreams," she would not for the world have missed a single meeting. And being a practical little body, with a knack of living out whatever creed she adopted, she set out, devoutly, to let her light shine, carrying the glow of the sacred week far into the late winter, and the early spring.

"Dear Lord," she whispered, as she tripped up the brown stone steps of Mrs. Chambers' elegant avenue residence, "Dear Lord, help me to be a living epistle here to-day, a witness for thee. Enable me to do something that thou canst approve, even in my humble calling." Such petitions always find their answering opportunity very soon.

Florence Chambers met the little milliner with a clouded and frowning face, on the threshold of the sewing-room. Florence was a belle, just out this season, and greatly admired, but her temper was not of the sweetest, though, outside her own home, few imagined that the pretty girl could sometimes be both cross and shrewish.

"Miss Armour," cried Miss Florence, "in your hurry to go to your meeting last night, you put Alice's feathers on my hat, and gave mine to her. It was very careless in you to make such a stupid mistake."

"I will change them at once," began Miss Armour.

"You cannot," said the young lady fretfully, "for my sister went away before daylight on a week's visit and has carried her hat with her. I only wanted to let you know how careless and stupid I thought you. I blame it entirely on your craze for going to meetings."

"But, dear Miss Florence," returned the little milliner with some heat, "I surely did my full day's work. I am sorry to have annoyed you, but I did not mean to do it. The meeting must not bear the blame."

"Oh! well!" was the answer, "when a blunder is made, apologies do not repair it. I shall take my hats after this to Madame Floubert," and the angry young woman walked away, hearing as she shut the door, the worker's plaintive regrets.

The little milliner was only a girl herself and human, so it is not strange that she could not see her work for tears, and that when she dashed them away a feeling of proud resentment sprang up in her heart, and dyed her cheek. But, presently, this text came into her mind, as if spoken by an audible voice, "The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." Thinking of this, she forgot the little flurry of the morning, finished the tasks she had set herself to do, and at noon went home to her cat, her cup of tea, and the little chop she broiled for herself over the coals of her landlady's range.

In the afternoon, the milliner had another engagement. It was one she had made for herself a Sabbath or two before, when sitting a couple of pews behind old Mrs. De Lancey, she had noticed how shabby and rusty that dear old friend's best bonnet had grown.

"The first day that I can make time," she had said, "I'll set a few stitches for grandmother DeLancey."

Mrs. DeLancey was left at home by herself all day, her daughters having places as saleswomen in a great and fashionable shop and her son being a book-keeper employed in a railroad freight office. Her son was a widower, and his little boy also shared the home, which was a pretty and very tidy flat, up four flights of stairs. The little boy was already a bread-winner with a place in an office. It was very merry and cheerful when they all came home at night, tired to be sure, but each with something pleasant to tell, and the only lonely time was for the old mother through the long day.

In glided the little milliner, as cheerful as a bird, and laid a half-dozen pink carnations on her friend's lap.

"I have two hours, Mrs. DeLancey," she said, "I've brought my needle and thread, my thimble and my scissors, and I've found a nice piece of black velvet in my bureau drawer, a piece which looks like you, and here I am, ready to make over your go-to-meeting bonnet."

"You dear child!" said the old lady, lifting the bonnet out of a large green bandbox, in which it kept company with an antique lace veil, a pair of black kid gloves and a folded kerchief meant for wearing around the neck.

"You have very few holiday hours, Mary," said Mrs. DeLancey, "I appreciate your spending some of them for me. Now tell me the text of last Sunday, please. It was dreadfully slippery, and the girls would not let me go out, and, poor things, they were too tired to go themselves."

"'We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed,'" reverently repeated the little milliner, adding softly, "Isn't it a true text, one that Christians can understand? And what do you think of this bit of verse, which I found in a newspaper yesterday," she said, pulling it out of her pocket, and putting it in her friend's hand.

There is nothing I can fear,
There is naught can bring me low,
Blessed Saviour, ever near,
Hopeful unto thee I go.

Though the way be dark and dreary,
And the pilgrim's feet are weary,
Yet the heart is full of cheer
With the Saviour ever near.

So the two women chatted over the bonnet, their hearts growing warm with love. Most of us are afraid to introduce our Christian experience into our ordinary talk, and so we lose precious inspiration and blessed help which might be ours.

But when the little milliner went home that night, she had no thought of the good seed she had been sowing. At the depths of her being, Florence Chambers had a conscience, though the shallows did not reflect its power. Happening to pick up the Bible on her dressing-table, as she was preparing to make her dinner toilette, the young girl opened at the very passage which had come into Miss Armour's mind; she read it, and was impressed:

"The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit."

"Why, that was what Miss Armour showed me to-day. There is something real in her religion, and I wish I had it myself. I behaved like a wretch, and I am ashamed of myself."

There came to the little milliner's house the next day a little box, which when opened, disclosed the sweet fragrance of violets, a lovely bunch of them, and with them was Florence Chambers' card, and on it these words, "Forgive me for my rudeness, I thank you for your gentle patience."

If the next regular prayer-meeting night found Florence in her place among the worshippers, it was to the little milliner's courtesy that the circumstance was due. Would we not do well, dear friends, to put our Christianity into practice more and more in our daily lives?

Mr. Beecher used to say pithily that some people prayed "cream," and lived "skim-milk." It should not be so with us.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

No more contributions of clothing will be received either at the stations 740-742 Broadway, or 15 Bible House, N. Y. Quantities already received and now in transit warrant the belief that nearly all wants have been supplied.

Mrs. M. Taylor, Brooklyn, writes the following, evoked by a recent article in this journal, entitled: "A Plea for the Birds:"

Oh, how my heart aches to see many lovely women wearing egret's plumes, and bringing up their daughters in the same paths. 'Any observant person who notices these plumes waving, not singly, but often in clusters, on the heads of so many women, must know that the slaughter has not been thousands but millions. It goes without saying that women must adorn themselves; but are there not many ways of doing it which need not involve such heartless cruelty? Ought not every good and gentle woman who has learned of it, to shun the responsibility of carrying aloft the trophies of such brutal work?'

R. A. W., Bluefield, W. Va. Does our Saviour's prohibition of swearing apply to the oath administered in courts of justice?

The Quakers and some other sects have so held. The majority of Christian people, however, differ with them. It is generally believed that Christ referred to a practice common among the Jews of that day of emphasizing an assertion by an oath, much as profane men at the present time garnish their talk with imprecations.

S. R. G., Armour, S. D. What constitutes a divine call to the ministry, or any other special work? Is an impression cherished from childhood sufficient?

God appears to indicate his will in the matter in different ways. A mere impression or desire to preach must not always be regarded as a call. Many have that, who are unfit for the work and are manifestly not called, because God never commissions any man for a task without giving him at the same time the qualifications for its performance. Where a man has earnest piety, an intense desire for service, a gift for speaking, and the consciousness of a message to deliver, and especially when he has already been used of God in the conversion of souls in the Sunday School or at small meetings, and if at the same time there is a providential opening of the way to the ministry—in such a combination there is fair ground for presuming that there is a divine call.

T., Milwaukee. Is a Christian minister justified in preaching on a Sunday morning about "The Health Department," "Vaccination," or a local strike? Is it not his duty to preach the Gospel?

It is undoubtedly his duty to preach the Gospel; but he has a perfect right to show how the principles of Christianity apply to the concerns of the present day, and if is his duty to do so. If members of his congregation are in doubt as to how a Christian ought to act in certain exigencies of business or public duty, they have a right to expect from their minister such light as he is able to give on the subject. If they are acting in a manner inconsistent with their Christian profession the minister would be recreant if he neglected to warn them. The minister's aim should be to help men to live the Christ life on earth in all their relations, and the more practical his sermons are, the better. Mere amusement or instruction in secular matters is out of place in the pulpit on the Lord's day.

One of Dr. Hall's Youthful Associates Revives Hallowed Memories of the Dead Missionary—A Touching Tribute

MR. Frederick J. Blanchard, of New York, a friend of the late Rev. W. J. Hall, missionary to Korea, whose recent death from typhus fever, contracted while laboring among the sick and wounded after the battle of Pyng-Yang, was related in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sends in the following interesting reminiscences of him:

"Dr. Hall was born near the village of Glen Buell, in Leed's County, Ontario, Canada, between thirty and thirty-five years ago. His parents were humble but devout Christians. When he was but a boy upon his father's farm, the seeds of Gospel truth were planted in his young heart by his pious parents. From boyhood he was noted for earnest unassuming piety. When not more than sixteen, he was one of the most energetic, active, devoted, self-sacrificing and successful Christian workers in the community where he lived.

"In 1883, he and I were fellow students, in Athens High School, located in his native county. Largely as the outcome of his zeal, a prayer-meeting among the students was organized, and weekly meetings were held in the school building. The meetings were productive of great good to the students. It was also our custom to conduct a prayer-meeting on Tuesday evenings, in our rooms, meeting from week to week in our various boarding places. Of the members who constituted that meeting, Dr. Hall has died in harness in a foreign mission field, mourned by thousands; Rev. Dr. Kilborn is a medical missionary in Central China, where Rev. Geo. Hartwell is also laboring; Dr. A. E. Bolton is a medical missionary among the Indians in British Columbia, with a hospital at Port Simpson; Rev. J. A. Dorman is a member of the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada; W. J. Hayes, from Dr. Hall's neighborhood, died about two years ago, a few months after his ordination into the ministry of the Methodist Church; J. A. Madden is a lawyer and an active Christian worker in Toronto, Canada, and W. J. Crummy, a young man ever zealous in the cause of Christ, and a leading spirit in all our meetings, went home to his reward eight years ago.

"Dr. Hall was 'instant in season and out of season,' yet his earnest, devoted efforts and words, were not offensive to the ungodly, whom he tried to lead to a better life and to Christ, as even the most irreverent and irreligious among his acquaintances have nought but words of praise to say of him. In Queen's College, Kingston, he was a recognized leader, especially in connection with the University Y. M. C. A. Later he came to New York accompanied by A. E. Bolton, as they believed their opportunities to qualify themselves for their chosen work, would be greater here, than in the smaller cities of their native country. His work while in New York, first as a student and then as a missionary, is well known.

"When leaving Kingston, in the course of a farewell address, he said, 'I have but one short life to live, and how can I best employ it.' It is written of the Master, 'He went about doing good,' and the same can truthfully be said of our departed brother.

"He is dead, yet he lives in the hearts and memories of all who knew him. To grasp his hand, to look into his eyes, to listen to his conversation, was in itself a rebuke to sin, and an inspiration to a holier and a better life, to know him intimately, was to love him. I have never known a man, who in my humble judgment, served God with as clean and perfect a heart, with all those words imply, as did the late Dr. Hall. I never read the words, 'In the morning sow thy seed and in the evening withhold not thy hand,' but what the revered face and life of my now departed friend and class-mate, presents itself before my mind's eye, as the most perfect exemplification of its teachings, of whom I have any knowledge.

"'God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform,' and while I cannot understand this mystery of God's Providence, I am confident he doeth all things well, and I pray sincerely, that as our brother's life was made a blessing to so many his death may be a great benediction to the people for whom he laid down his life."

THE CZAR OF THE JEWS.

The Jewish "Missionary Herald," for January, 1895, says: "By a ukase of the late Emperor Alexander III., a large number of Jews were under orders to quit the Crimea on October 20th, 1894. Many who could not dispose of their businesses and possessions did not obey the order, and during the last days of the late Emperor his full instructions were not carried out. Thus many Jews remained in the various towns and villages where they had been living. On the conclusion of the festivities at the marriage of the new Czar, the community petitioned Nicholas II. to allow them to remain in their homes till they could comply with the command. The Czar replied by telegram: 'The Jews of the Crimea can stay there as long as they are willing to stop.' Moreover, just a week after Alexander III. died, Jews residing in Yalta were also to have been expelled from their homes and driven away to the Pale of Settlement, which has been well described as 'the Russian analogue of the Black Hole of Calcutta.' Under the circumstances the law was not immediately enforced. This afforded the Jews an opportunity of trying to bring their case before the new Sovereign. They journeyed to Livadia and persuaded a well-known minister of religion to secure for them admission to the Audience Chamber of Nicholas II. The minister presented their petition, to which the Czar replied: 'The Jews of Yalta will be allowed to reside there in peace.' It is also stated, by the 'Voskhod,' that the authorities in Wilna have 'recently received from the Minister of the Interior a proposal to stop the expulsion of Jews from the fifty verst zone of the frontier, mentioning therein also another suggestion with regard to cancelling the law of the fifty verst zone altogether."

UNDER SEALED ORDERS.

OUTIDE she swung her moorings,
And over the harbor bar:
As the moon was slowly rising
She faded from sight afar.
And we traced her gleaming canvas
By the twinkling evening star.
None knew the port she sailed for,
Nor whither her cruise would be;
Her future course was shrouded
In silence and mystery;
She was sailing under "sealed orders,"
To be opened when at sea.

So souls cut off from moorings,
Go drifting into the night,
Darkness before and around them,
With scarce a glimmer of light;
They are acting under "sealed orders,'
Are sailing by faith, not sight.
Keeping the line of duty
Through good and evil report,
They shall ride the storms out safely,
Be the passage long or short;
For the ship that carries God's orders
Shall anchor at last in port.

THE MILLENNIUM.

The Characteristics of the Reign of Christ on Earth and the Changes to take Place Before it is Inaugurated.

BY REV. C. J. OLIVER.*

A THOUSAND years' rest for the world, a thousand years' simultaneous truce in all war between the spirit and the flesh, between man and man, between God and the devil. Rejoice, O, ye inhabitants of the earth; re-echo our rejoicings, O, ye children of the skies! A thousand years will Satan be bound, says Holy Writ; a thousand years shall we have peace on earth, responds the universal heart of man.

Sin, as a condition, continues; sinning as an overt action, ceases. Sickness, weakness, weariness, and pain will be unknown; they are the fruits of sin, and in the Millennium sin is not permitted to show blossom or bear fruit.

It is a time of sowing and of reaping, "but one shall not plant and another eat;" "they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them;" "they shall not build and another inhabit it;" "they shall long enjoy the work of their hands." A time of building houses, but the poor man shall not build for himself and the extortioner inhabit it; "they shall not labor in vain;" a time of buying and selling; of abundant commerce. Men will "eat" and "drink" and "sing," but not "weep." The peaceful dominion inaugurated in Eden shall obtain at last; there will be no poison in the fang of the viper, no scent of blood to lure the tiger, no rotting dead to tempt the jackal; no ferocity shall lead the bear to rend or the wolf to raven in the fold.

What is the Millennium? A time when God will vindicate himself by making the world as if no sin had marred its beauty, perfect in all its appointments; in all the realm of nature there can be no lack and no redundancy. There can be no imperfect or mutilated forms of men, no lame, no blind, no deaf, no dumb. "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert" (Isa. 35).

When? No one need feel any hesitation in putting the beginning of the Millennium within the twelve hundred years which precede the end of all temporal things. We measure the duration of the Millennium by the period of Satan's incarceration, and the relation of that period to other events enables us to locate the Millennium, as its beginning and end, and say, when Satan is chained at the close of Armageddon, which marks its beginning; while at the close of the Millennium he is liberated for the so-called "little season." He then proceeds at once to stir up disaffection, to enroll recruits, to organize his sub-millennial army, and come up against the "camp of the saints" "as the sand of the sea:" and the "consummation determined" (Dan. 9: 27) is wrought in "fire which comes down from heaven and devours them." The "little season" seems to be less than two hundred years, which is a "little" period, indeed, as compared with any of the extended ones that have preceded it.

We return to our question, When? When Christ shall have achieved that quiet advent wherein "one is taken and another left," and before he "shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God." When? When the plagues, none of which antedate the coming of the Son of man, shall culminate in the trampling out of sin on the earth by the white-robed hosts of heaven, and before the innumerable hordes of Gog and Magog shall gather from the regions still beyond and move down upon the citadel of God, the capital of Christ. When? When man has suffered the reward and the result of sin from Adam to Armageddon, and God declares a truce that the millions of men then living may consider his offer of eternal amnesty in Jesus Christ. When? Why, then shall be and that shall be man's Millennial opportunity to make his peace with God.

*From his new work, entitled The Third Period of the Apocalypse Explained. Pp. 426; price $1.50. May be obtained from the author, 77 Larkin St., Atlanta, Ga. Mr. Oliver has evidently devoted considerable study to the unfulfilled prophecies, and has struck out for himself an original and ingenious theory in regard to them. While we are unable to endorse all his conclusions, we commend the work to students of prophecy as one containing much that is valuable and suggestive.

LESSONS FROM A PARABLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Feb. 17. Luke 10: 25-37. Missionary Topic.

IN choosing as a basis for a Missionary Topic the Parable of the Good Samaritan, the Committee shows its adherence to principles and methods of teaching which the Church is rapidly abandoning. Our Lord's teaching was of that broad type which is capable of infinite varieties of application. The principles he laid down were those that transform the soul. The man who receives them finds that they affect his whole life and conduct. They "leaven the whole lump." If he becomes in heart and spirit like the Good Samaritan, he can see no one in need of help of any kind without feeling an impulse to give that help. Thus his sympathies go out to the world lying in the darkness of heathenism and he gladly co-operates in the effort to send the Gospel to those who have it not. He knows what the Gospel can do for the individual and the nation and he longs to have its beneficent influence reach to every land. His sympathy with the heathen springs from the same spirit which Christ commended in the Good Samaritan. All honor to those who yield to the impulse, to the noble men and women who leave home and country and go out at the risk of health and life to extend the kingdom of Christ. All honor, too, to the people who give their money to make such work possible. The effort should never decline; men and money should always be forthcoming for such work and they always will be, while the Spirit of the Good Samaritan is at work in the Church. And the more effectually it is at work the more men and women and the more money will be consecrated to this purpose.

But the Church in these days is learning a different lesson from the Parable than that of activity in the foreign mission field. It has noticed that in the story, Christ did not represent the Good Samaritan as going to the wounded man and preaching to him, or offering him a tract. The divine spirit in him recognized the man's need and adapted his benevolence to his need. Although the wounded man was "half dead," the Samaritan whom our Lord commended, concerned himself with his body, not with his soul. Under the guidance of men such as those who selected the Parable for "a missionary topic," the Church of the past century has been giving tracts and preaching, when it should have given the oil and wine of life. This it ought to have done and not left the other undone. Christ was never indifferent to the hunger, or to the physical suffering of those around him. He sought to save men altogether—body, soul and spirit. Would he think we were obeying the injunction with which he closed the Parable, if he were here to-day? The Church has given freely to charity; probably our great hospitals, orphanages, and other charities derive the bulk of their support from Christian people; but there has not been hitherto the thoughtful adaptation of remedial measures to the crying need which was seen in the behavior of the Samaritan. The church has stood by indifferent, while the poor have suffered wrong and neglect. It has made no effort, in short, to give those who have fallen on life's highway, who have been robbed and maltreated, the help of which they stood in need. If the intelligence and the acumen that have been spent in defining and defending doctrine, in disputing about how much water should be used in baptism, and at what time it should be applied, had been devoted to finding a remedy for the anomalies of our social conditions, the world would be a far happier world to-day than it is. The contempt Christ poured on the men who were particular about paying a tithe of the sprigs of mint in their garden, while they robbed the widow and the fatherless, he must have felt for those of his professed followers who were too busy disputing about sublapsarianism and supralapsarianism to give any attention to the condition and the wrongs of the poor around them. The man who contracts disease from the foul-smelling alley in which his poverty compels him to live; the man who dies for the lack of nourishment and medical attention, while another, no better than he, but more fortunate, has a surplus of wealth beyond his power to use; the man who is able to work and willing to work, but can find no one to employ him; the woman whose wages are so low and precarious that she is constantly confronted with the alternative of starvation or sin—all these are justified in asking with indignation if the Church has obeyed her Master's injunction to look upon the Good Samaritan and "go and do likewise." Thank God, the time has come when the duty of studying the problem of poverty and of devising some means of doing for the poor what the Good Samaritan did for the wayfarer—giving him the help he needs—is being felt.

THE WESTERN DISTRESS.

During the past week the gifts of clothing for the destitute people in the Western counties of Nebraska and Kansas have poured in from Young People's Societies of all names and denominations. It would have gladdened the hearts of these young people, if they could have looked into our Central Relief Depot, to see the barrels, boxes and packages of clothing, blankets, shoes and all kinds of gifts which have been sent to us, and have been forwarded with all speed to the West. They would have thanked God that the spirit that was in the Good Samaritan had moved so many hearts. This world is a better world than some of us thought, and we see proof of the fact in the response that has come to the appeal for the sufferers. Our young people are not asking with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" but have shown their concern for their brothers whom they may have never seen, by keeping them from the pangs of hunger and cold, in short, by keeping them alive. The contributions have been far greater and more numerous than we dared hope. So much has come that there is now sufficient to supply every need. If there is in Nebraska or Kansas a single sufferer who lacks clothing it is because his need is unknown to our distributors. No more is required, and if any Society is preparing a contribution, it will be well not to send it to us, but use it for some other destitute people, of whom, unhappily, there are many to be found in every State. Again, we tender our thanks to the Societies, Leagues, and Unions which have sent contributions of money and clothing in response to our appeal—we thank them in the name of the people whose wants they have helped to relieve, and In His Name, who said: "I was naked and ye clothed me. Inasmuch as ye did it to to these, ye did it unto me."

THE NEW BUILDING OF THE Y. M. C. A. OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

A WESTERN Y. M. C. A.

On this page is a picture of the new building recently erected for the use of the Young Men's Christian Association of Minneapolis, Minn. The Association is one of the oldest in the Western States. It was organized in 1866, and is, therefore, in its maturity of vigorous life. Its last published record shows a membership of 987 and probably it has now passed into the honor group, of the "Associations of four figures." More than half its members are on the active list which is always a good test of an Association's right to its title. The record of over ten thousand attendance on the religious meetings of the year is an additional evidence of its spirituality. Its educational work, which comprises eleven departments is also flourishing and that it is heartily appreciated is evident from the fact that nearly two hundred young men are registered students and many of them in several departments. The Association has now a well equipped gymnasium with baths, lockers, etc. None can ever estimate the value of such an institution in a great city like Minneapolis, where young men have need of every kind of help that Christ's people can give them in their struggle against temptation.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

Many of the Leagues are arranging for a Lincoln evening, on Feb. 12, in celebration of the birthday of the Martyr President. —— The League is making great progress in the Hanibal Distrtct of the Missouri Conference. At the Hope Street Church there is a special advantage in the fact that Dr. S. R. Reno, the pastor, has held the office of President of the District League and is therefore an efficient and enthusiastic leader. Macon has for its leader Rev. Price A. Crow, who is the present President of the District. Louisiana has a League with seventy-five members, all of them good workers. Brookfield, Centralia and Rush Hill are all in efficient service. ——Dr. S. A. Steel is urging the Southern Leagues to make special efforts for the evangelization of the colored people around them. He suggests special services, the distribution of religious literature and Bible classes. Volunteer teachers from the League might also have classes for the most ignorant some of whom would be glad to learn to read. This implies personal service which after all is more to be valued than gifts of money.——A proof of the efficiency of Junior work in the League comes from Wisconsin. Fifteen members have received diplomas after examination from the Chautauqua Union. Mrs. Sharpe is the leader.——The Executive Committee of the Southern League Board at its recent meeting at Nashville, Tenn., appointed four courses of reading. The Biblical and Doctrinal comprised besides Scriptural selections, Dr. Godbey's "Methodist Church Members' Manual;" the Historical Course comprised Dr. Lovejoy's "History of Methodism" and the "History of the English Bible;" the Biographical Course has only one book, Lucy Larcom's "New England Girlhood;" the Miscellaneous Course comprises Ruskin's "Sesame and Lilies," Mrs. Campbell's "Prisoners of Poverty," "the Imitation of Christ." The Committee also passed a resolution of confidence in Dr. Steel's editorial charge of "The Epworth Era," and commended the paper to the Leagues.——In several New England Districts the League is doing good work for the poor. The League of Brayton Church at Fall River has commenced a series of charming entertainments which have attracted large audiences, and the proceeds have been turned over to the Mercy and Help Department. The money is very welcome, for there was a protracted strike in the district recently, and the effects are still felt.——The League at the Metamora, (O.) Church of which Rev. W. Spencer is pastor, has a grand record for its past year's work. It gathered one hundred bushels of wheat, fifteen bushels of potatoes, and $60 in money for families who lost everything in the late fire that burned the business part of the town to the ground. The League has undertaken to raise $200 toward building a new church in place of the one burned.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Seventeen members of South Australian Christian Endeavor Societies are now laboring in foreign missionary fields.

A Presbyterian Christian Endeavor Society of Union, S.C., puts one of the elders of the church on each of the committees, as an ex-officio member. This places all branches of society work directly under the supervision of the church officers.

The National Convention of English Christian Endeavor Societies is to be held at Birmingham, June 1-4. Two large halls have been engaged for the meetings. Eminent men of various denominations have promised to attend and take part in the proceedings.

A Young Men's Christian Association at Swansea, Wales, has inaugurated a useful work in a series of lectures on Christian Evidences to enable young men to meet the objections and arguments of sceptics. The lectures are highly appreciated as such a series would be in any large town in this country.

Many new Christian Endeavor Societies are being formed in China. Reports have been received of three at Nanking alone which have been organized within a month. Rev. A. A. Fulton of Canton, writes that there will soon be organized there a Canton Christian Endeavor Union. He also reports that Endeavor work is to be begun in Amoy.

At a largely-attended consecration meeting in connection with the Central South London Christian Endeavor Union held at Christ Church, Rev. F. B. Meyer presided. The motto text for the year was given "Thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my Lord the King shall appoint" (II Sam. 15: 15). Mr. Meyer urged the members to be at all times ready for the work.

Mr. John Willis Baer, General Secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, writes: "You will be glad to know that since report was made, last October, our net increase in the official enrolment of Societies is 1293. We now have 37,002 Societies in our world-wide fellowship, with a total membership of 2,223,800. Of these the number of Societies is 3993."

The Young Women's Christian Association of Dundee, Scotland, has a Letter Mission as one of its departments. It commenced about ten years ago. There were only ten workers connected with it at that time, and about 400 letters distributed every month. There are still the ten heads, but these are now assisted by eighty-nine other ninety workers, while 1600 letters are distributed monthly.

STRANGE.

'Tis strange that we seldom seem thankful
For the blessings around us that lie;
Strange that we 're always complaining,
Doubting and questioning "Why?"
Strange that the world moves on ever,
Ne'er missing a link in its chain;
Strange the world's filled so with gladness
When hearts are nigh broken with pain.

So strange that we seek not the sunshine;
Strange that we shun not the cloud;
Strange we accept not the beauty
Of eternity—heaven avowed.
So strange that we grope here in darkness,
When our Saviour proclaimeth the light;
Strange that we tarry in weakness,
But stranger his grace and his might.

Alaskan Children.

The Little Folks in that Icy Clime no Longer Neglected—Eskimos at School.

PROBABLY in no part of the world has Christianity and the introduction of Christian missions accomplished more for the intellectual and spiritual advancement of any race than in Alaska. Only a few years ago, the Eskimo of that great territory were ignorant heathen. To-day, Alaska has a school population of ten thousand, with over thirty schools, of which sixteen are day schools and the remainder contract. These schools are supplied jointly by the Government and the Missionary Societies of the Presbyterian, Moravian, Episcopal, Methodist, Congregational, Lutheran and other churches.

In his report on education in Alaska, Rev. Sheldon Jackson describes interestingly the result of this system of instruction. There are among the scholars many industrious pupils who, in addition to being clothed, housed and fed, are taught shoemaking, house-building, furniture-making, coopering, baking, gardening and the care of cattle by the boys while the girls learn cooking, baking, washing, ironing, sewing, dressmaking, housekeeping, and other useful branches.

One of the girl-pupils at Point Barrow, Alaska, is shown in the accompanying illustration, from a photograph by Mr. Sheldon. When the first school was opened at Point Barrow, the majority of the natives were away on a fishing and hunting expedition. Food was scarce, and the whole outlook was unpromising. There were strange native prejudices against education, and at the outset the influence of the native sorcerers or priests kept many of the children away from school the first year. As winter advanced, more attended. They were well-behaved and seemed to remember what they learned. Soon the little folks began to use the English language, even on the play-ground.

Excellent schools have also been established at Point Hope, Cape Prince of Wales, Unalaliklik, Anoik, Kososiffsky, Nulato, Cape Vancouver, Bethel, Carmel, Unalaska, Metlakhatla, and also at different points in the Kadiak and Sitka districts. The children quickly mastered the alphabet, learned to spell and pronounce English, to write neatly and to sing Gospel hymns and patriotic songs. They were taught cleanly habits and to make their own clothing. The result of these teachings has been admirable, and the rising generation of Alaskans bids fair to be emancipated from the Shamanism and sorcery which constituted the native religion and to become good, moral, well-behaved Christian men and women, and a blessing to their native land.

This is only a faint outline of what Christian missions have already done for the children of Alaska.

A Child's Love of Knowledge.

The thoughts of childhood are deep thoughts. Oftener than we think we are given opportunity to guide these thoughts. Children are far keener than we commonly fancy in detecting the unsatisfactoriness of meagre and shallow definitions. The logic with which they will often run down a fallacy is merciless. A child does not need to be led by degrees into a knowlege of God. As soon as he is capable of learning that his voice can be heard by his loving mother or his loving father in another room, he is capable of learning that his voice can be heard by a loving Father whom he has never seen; who is always within hearing, but never within sight; who is the loving Father of his father and mother, as well as of himself and everybody else; who is able to do all things, and who is sure to do all things well. In the knowledge of this truth, a child can be taught to pray to God in faith as early as he can speak; and even to know something of the meaning of prayer before he can utter words intelligently. One important way in which children obtain information is by the asking of questions. The beginnings of their education are achieved through interrogation. They have been not inaptly called "animated interrogation points." Such a new and wonderful world has opened upon them, and one piece of knowledge so leads to another that they are induced to proceed, and can ascend only on the steps of questions. For this reason it becomes a matter of transcendent importance how we answer them. It is just here that many people fail, and more especially in matters of information in regard to religious truth and teaching. When it comes to questionings upon religious themes many parents and teachers do not answer children at all, while some others put them off with some foolish evasion.

The Mother's Sacred Charge.

Early impress your little ones with the truth that all we have is a gift from God, a sacred trust to be accounted for, and that the more we have the more we are under the obligation to serve others. Herein lies the secret of eradicating selfishness. "For even Christ came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Let this thought encourage us amid the cares and perplexities of the ever-recurring household duties, that the little child receiving his first lessons in life at our hands may be so influenced that he shall carry the light of the Son of Righteousness to those we have longed to reach:

You are guiding the little footsteps in the way they ought to walk;
You are dropping a word for Jesus in the midst of your household talk;
Living your life for love's sake, till the homely cares grow sweet,
And sacred the self-denial that is laid at the Master's feet.

The Faith of the Young.

The training of a child's faith is the most delicate and the most important duty that devolves upon one who is set to the work of child-training. More is involved in it for the child's welfare, and more depends upon it for the child's enjoyment and efficiency in life, than pivots on any other phase of the training of a child. He who would train a child's faith aright has need of wisdom, and yet more has need of faith,—just such faith as that to the exercise of which he would train the child of his charge.

If you tell a child that God is able and ready to give him everything he prays for, the child is prompt to accept your statement as a truth, and so he prays for a pleasant day, when a pleasant day is desired by him. If the pleasant day comes accordingly, the child's faith in prayer is confirmed; but if the day be a stormy one, the child's mind is bewildered, and a doubt is likely to creep into his mind whether prayer is always so effective as he had been told to believe it to be.

Peculiarly has a parent need to watch lest he check or hinder unduly the loving promptings of a child's faith; for it is our Lord himself who has said: Whoso shall cause one of these little ones which believe on Me to stumble, it is profitable for him that a great millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be sunk in the depth of the sea."

AN EMPRESS'S BIBLE.

THIS pleasant incident is related by a lady missionary in China: In Shanghai it is a time of feasting and jollity, as though the times were the "piping times of peace." On the broad main avenue of the English settlement are all the young elite of Shanghai with gay equipages and gayer dress. The native city and the streets are full of people running hither and thither with lanterns and cheap ornaments for the decorations that are meant to celebrate the Empress's birthday, soon to dawn.

But a different crowd gathered, one afternoon, in one of the Christian churches, to see the birthday gift of the Chinese Christian women to their Empress. It is a most beautiful gift—the casket alone costing $500. It is 15 x 12 x 4 inches, made of silver, elaborately ornamented with bamboo leaves and birds. A gold plate on the top bears the inscription in Chinese characters. It is lined with olive green plush and fits into a box, covered, within and without, with plush. The "Bible" is the New Testament printed in large type on fine foreign paper, with a broad gilt border and gilt edges. The cover is of silver embossed like the casket, the whole cost amounting to $1200. It is to be sent immediately to Peking, with earnest hopes that it may reach it destination, and many prayers that the proud Empress may learn the beautiful lesson of the meek and lowly Jesus' life.

Housekeeper's Sunday.

Housekeepers need one day in seven for rest as much as any other class of laborers, but too often the Sabbath is crowded with work that seems inevitable. While some duties must be performed, Sunday's work may be greatly lessened. Much work may be saved on Sunday in the cooking. During the week the wise housewife will plan all her Sunday meals and purchase everything needed. It does not look very consistent to see professed Christians patronize butcher shops, bakeries, milk and ice wagons on the Lord's day. The mother's Sabbath is not complete unless some time is spent in religious instruction, and by an attractive recital of Bible stories, early teaching a love for God's word. This hour can be made one of real pleasure to the little ones if wisely conducted, and will be a bright spot in their memories and an incentive to right living in the years to come. A calm, useful, well-spent Sabbath is the crowning joy of the whole week.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A Wedding.

GOING back into the parlor, Dr. Gordon found Annie still sitting at the piano. He seated himself behind her, and, laying his hand over on her's he stopped the chords and said: "Your obstacle is removed, Annie, much to my joy. Your brother says he made no regular contract about your teaching, thinking you might become tired and wish to stop without notice. He will write to President Clarke tonight. It is all right now, is it not?"

"I do not know," Annie replied. "I want to act honorably toward President Clarke, whether there was a contract or not. I must write to him and ascertain if it will not inconvenience him for me to resign at once. He may be depending upon my assistance next term."

"But I am depending on you, too," Dr. Gordon pleaded. "I urge a stronger claim if his is a prior claim. Now be good, and don't set up any ridiculous obstacles. There are a score of efficient teachers who could be secured in a week to fill your place in the college, but who is there who could fill your place in my home? You would really be doing some poor girl a kindness by creating a vacancy on President Clarke's staff; you don't know what a boon that position may be to the girl who succeeds you and I beg you let her get the place at once and not keep her waiting."

"How much you are concerned all at once about this imaginary young person! You see your pleas are not disinterested, but I admit there is some sense in them. In any case I will write President Clarke, and find out if he can release me at once without inconvenience, and if so, I will not go back."

"Now Annie, you are reasonable, and I am sure all will be satisfactorily arranged, and we can be married as soon as you get President Clarke's reply."

"We could be, but why such desperate haste? I must have time to get accustomed to the idea, at least. Only last week I had my plans for service and usefulness among the poor all arranged. I intended to fill up my vacation in that way and then go back to college. Now you have disarranged everything. I am confused and bewildered."

"You will soon recover. Let us fix it for the beginning of next month."

Annie smiled, and began: "But, Dr. Gordon, you surely do not want to be married so soon? The idea of being married next month! Who ever heard of such a thing!"

"Who cares, we will institute something new. I don't care one straw for fashion or custom. You are the first and only woman I ever loved, and somehow I am afraid of losing sight of you for a moment, for fear of losing you altogether. Annie, don't oppose me. I don't believe I will be fit for work, until I feel that I have secured you. Say yes to next month, won't you?"

"I do not see how I can do that. Why are you in such haste? Do you think I am the same light, changeable girl you used to know? But I need not ask you that, for you would not have asked me to be your wife if you did not know I was changed. I suppose you are drawing an unfair inference from my accepting you at once. You think I did it impulsively and I may change my mind, is it not so?"

"Do not put such a possibility in words, Annie. I cannot bear to think that such a thing could be. It is only that a great happiness has come near to me, so great that to lose it would be worse than death, and I tremble at the thought that it might happen."

"Well I must teach you patience and trust, dear. You must trust God as well as me. If God designs the happiness you crave, you know there can be no doubt that you will have it. Why should I not say that we shall have it. You must not think me unwomanly if I say that I, too, regard it as a great joy, I am looking forward to great happiness in your companionship, and there is no reason why I should conceal it from you. I thank God for the love that has come to me, and for the answering love in my breast. It is very good of him to have so enriched my life. But I can wait, and I want you to be good."

"Very well, I will be good this time and yield. Let it be six weeks from to-day, then."

So it was agreed that in about six weeks Annie was to be Dr. Gordon's wife. The question of trips was discussed, but Annie said she preferred a plain, unostentatious wedding, with only the family and Mrs. Somers present, after which it was agreed that they were to settle down in their own home.

During the days that intervened between the agreement and the marriage-day, Roy seemed unusually busy. Now he was here, now there, now his wife must go with him, and often they were in secret conclave.

Day after day passed by and at last the eventful one arrived. It arose bright and beautiful. Roy's phaeton was unusually busy, hurrying to and fro until night. At five they were to be married, a supper given them, then they were to go at once to their future home, and where this was Annie did not know. It was all involved in mystery.

Annie looked unusually lovely in her rich pear silk, with natural flowers at her throat and in her hair. She was really more beautiful than on her first bridal night when her dress, a marvel of lace aud pearls called forth the admiration and the envy of her fashionable friends. There was calm happiness on her face and Dr. Gordon's heart seemed overflowing. The supper was elegant, for it was universally conceded that the entertainments at the St. Clair's were very stylish, and on this occasion neither money nor taste was wanting. All was over, ceremony, supper, presents given, and congratulations extended, and at ten o'clock Dr. Gordon turned to his wife and said: "The phaeton is ready, Annie, shall we go?"

Good-night was said all around, and they left. As soon as they were alone Dr. Gordon said:

"Annie, Roy's royal gift to you is your future home. Ours is a noble brother! He selected a home, he says, that you always half way coveted, a sort of Naboth's vineyard to you. He actually bought the owner out of it, and he has furnished it,he and his wife, entire, pantry and all. They would not let me touch it or even go to see it."

"How good!" exclaimed Annie from a full heart. "This is Roy's crowning gift of gifts. How can I thank him enough!"

Annie guessed that it was the Italian villa in the suburbs,with its park, vineyard and orchard, and so it was. Within and without everything was complete. Dr. Gordon had provided servants; so when they drove within the yard, they found themselves before a brilliantly lighted house.

In the sitting-room the servant left them alone, and there they bowed in prayer, thanking God for mercies showered upon them, and most of all for each other. In that prayer they dedicated themselves to work together for Jesus, and Annie's audible "Amen" showed how heartily she gave herself to this work.

Now weeks flew, months flew in the midst of happy home duties, duties as wife, duties as friend, duties as the child of the most High God. These filled Annie's time and heart. Life was not a calm, placid lake, always unruffled, reflecting only the clear blue of heaven, but often and often there were wavelets dashing to and fro, troubles which sent her quickly to the throne of grace for strength, and to the home of Mrs. Somers for Christian counsel.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Christian Wife and Mother.

As years glided by, changes came into Annie's household. The first was in the form of a little rosebud, which began to expand its rosy petals in the shape of a lovely little girl. She was, at Annie's request, named Mabel, after Dr. Gordon's mother. She was a sweet, good baby, and, as she grew, she developed into a child, delicate in form and feature, but very gentle and lovely.

"Does not Mabel frighten you?" asked Annie of her husband one day. "She seems so spirituelle, that I have a fear that some day a pair of wings will expand and she will take flight. I wish there was a little more of human nature about her."

"She is certainly the sweetest child I ever saw, laying aside a father's prejudices, you know. The other day when you dressed her so beautifully, with sleeves caught up showing her snow white arms, I took her riding, and stopped at my office and carried her into Mr. Chapman's office which is opposite mine. You know, he is an old bachelor, I tell him from necessity, for I never saw a man who loved women and babies so much. As soon as he caught sight of my fairy girl, he heaved a deep sigh, shut up the dispensatory he was studying, and said in a melancholy tone when I introduced her:

"'You don't say so, Doc!'"

"But I do, though, I said. She's mine. Wouldn't you like the facsimile?"

"'That depends,' he said, 'on who would own tother half—but I believe I'd take that little beauty both halves—Baby, tum to your old uncle,' and Mabel laughed and actually held out her arms to go to him. He was in ecstasy; danced her about the room, jumped up and down with her, until the perspiration stood in great beads upon his forehead. He didn't want me to bring her away. As I started, I looked back and said, 'Go and do likewise, my friend,' and I left him scratching his head and sighing."

"I think," said Annie, that every man who loves women and babies ought to have one of each, and I commiserate your old bachelor friend sincerely."

"So do I. How I managed to live so long without them I am sure I cannot see!"

A year passed; and another little life was added to the Gordon family, a big, bouncing healthy boy. Another immortal to train for heaven," said Annie, and her mother's heart was full. As little Mabel at her birth was dedicated to Jesus, so was the boy Wallace, whom Annie had named after his father.

Another child added greatly to Annie's care and anxiety. Mrs. Somers was still the spiritual mother in whom she confided. In her relation of wife her troubles were few, for Dr. Gordon was a model husband, bestowing every tender attention upon her,and relieving her of labor whenever it was in his power, and in every possible way aiding in her daily duties. They were by no means rich, so economy was necessarily practiced by Annie. By Roy's kind generosity they had a commodious home, comfortably, nay, even elegantly furnished, and surrounded by spacious grounds which it was Annie's delight to cultivate. Dr. Gordon's professional practice was large and constantly on the increase. He was popular as a man, and pre-eminently successful as a practitioner. He was constituted with a rare combination of qualities as nurse as well as a physician. His touch was so gentle, his step so soft and voice so sympathetic, but this was not all. Better than these womanly qualities he was a Christian physician, and while he ministered to the body, he did not forget the soul, for while relieving the sufferer, he whispered many a tender warning entreaty. How rare a combination!

"I book annually over $5000," he remarked to Annie one day, but though they were now increasing in worldly goods and were on the road to wealth, still they were neither of them elated on account of it. They rather felt that prosperity was harder for the Christian to bear than adversity, hence as wealth increased so did prayer. The list of families in which he practised was lengthening, and he was busy day and night, still he found ample time to love his wife and children, and to tell them so. He did not start off in the morning leaving a wife starving at home for words of affection, her hungry heart forever unsatisfied.

Upon one occasion, Dr. Gordon had attended a medical convention in an adjoining State, with a friend, and they were absent a week. A few days after their return, this friend's wife called informally one morning to see Annie. She had by nature an unusually bright face, but now it was troubled, and Annie could not divine the cause. Feeling very happy herself on account of her husband's safe return, she wondered to find her friend's face so clouded. She know this lady to be one of the most devoted of wives, and very demonstrative. More than this, since her husband had met with heavy losses, she knew that she had taken music pupils, and had, for a long time, supported herself and children almost entirely by her own individual exertions. Besides this, she was saving the expense of both cook and housemaid by doing her own housework. Annie knew these facts, but now her quick eye discerned something wrong, and she waited patiently for the key note, which was struck at last, and on this wise:

"Mrs. Gordon, I want to ask you a question, a silly one, but nevertheless I want you to answer me. What was the first thing your husband said to you when he came home the other night?"

"Said to me? First thing? Let me think—Oh, (laughing), I don't believe I want to tell you."

"Please do. I am anxious to know, and it is not mere idle curiosity that prompts my question."

"It was only one of Dr. Gordon's ordinary speeches, I do not like to repeat it."

"That is just what I want to hear, one of his ordinary speeches—please tell me."

"It was only one of his little love speeches, that will not sound half so sweet from my lips as they do from his, but since you ask, I will tell you. When Dr. Gordon arrived it was just supper time. I was a little uncertain about his coming, but nevertheless I had put on his favorite white dress, and was just fastening a white rose in my hair, when I suddenly found myself in somebody's arms, and on turning in surprise, I found myself rapturously kissed, and between the kisses, that somebody managed to say:

"'Bless my darling! I haven't seen a woman since I've been gone half so sweet, half so beautiful as my own darling wife.'

"Now I have told you, and I am ashamed because I have."

"I am very sure, Mrs. Gordon, that there is nothing to be ashamed of in such a greeting as that, indeed you might well be proud of such words as those. I know you think me foolish, and that these tears that will come are exceedingly silly, but I can't help it. I am not one bit jealous, never have seen anyone I was the least jealous of, have never seen a man I would exchange for my husband, and I am confident that he loves me. Oh! just let me get sick, and he thinks I am about to die, and he is almost distracted with grief, he cannot find language sweet enough for me then, but it is entirely different as soon as I get well! I think it is a sad state of things when a husband has to wait for sickness before he can tell his wife that he loves her. Now I am not one to confide domestic troubles to my neighbors, but I am going to repeat to you my greeting. I, too, had put on his favorite dress, and in it, I was standing over a hot stove trying to prepare his favorite supper, and when I heard the buggy stop, I threw my cooking apron in the corner, and ran out to the gate overjoyed to see him. These were his words after he kissed me and while he was fastening his horse:

"'Howdy, how are you and all of the children,' then not waiting to hear, he went on, 'I've just had the nicest kind of a time! I've seen just the prettiest girls and sweetest little widows! Couldn't help flying 'round a little,' but 'dear me,' says I to myself, 'you needn't be looking so captivating, sir, you are not a widower yet.' So I kept pretty straight, you know, as a man well could under such trying circumstances. Ha, ha, ha! What's the matter? jealous, hey?'"

Poor hungry, starving wives! Ireland raises beseeching hands and cries to America for her famishing thousands, and meetings are called, purses are opened, and help and sympathy are quickly sent. The Mississippi bursts its levees, and houses and starving people float down the angry flood, and the legislatures of the States vote ample means to relieve the suffering. Alas! in silence, in wounded love and pride, in bitter tears, thousands of wives are starving right here on America's shores,—starving for little words of love from thoughtless husbands,—starving for acts that cost nothing,—for tender smiles that would bring no money in market, that are worthless everywhere but at home, to everyone but to patient, toiling, longing wives!

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 62. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

"Forbid a fool a thing and that he will do." Don't use SAPOLIO

A BISHOP UMBRELLA-MENDER.

The late Rt. Rev. J. S. Hill, Bishop of Western Equatorial Africa, who gave his life in the cause of the people, appears from an incident, mentioned in the biography just published, to have learned the lesson of the Apostle Paul. His biographer says: "The Bishop's occupations at Onitsha were multifarious—from surveying in the woods to cooking in the kitchen. For sometime he was head cook for the party. The heathen all loved him, for he had always a kind word for them and was ready to do anything for them. Once an old heathen chief sent him his huge variegated umbrella to mend, and the Bishop spent a whole evening mastering the job, and returned it whole, much to the delight of its owner. They called him their father, and mourned him long and sincerely."

HOW A GREAT MISSION STARTED.

Ganendro, a Hindu boy, attended a mission school in Calcutta, learned the truths of Christianity and lost his faith in Hinduism. His father was displeased and sent him to his country house where he was kept a prisoner for many years. In the Zenana of this house he found his little wife. She was eager to learn, and he helped her gain an education. Together they studied the Bible. The wife died at the age of seventeen, but the young man became a true believer in Jesus Christ. A school was started in 1852, for the purpose of training European and Eurasian young women as teachers. This is the story of the origin of the Zenana, Bible, and Medical Mission.

RELIEF STILL FLOWING IN.

od and Seed Now the Principal Needs of the Afflicted West—Dr. Klopsch's Tour of Investigation—Substantial Relief Work in Nebraska and Kansas—Colorado also Helped—Kansas takes Official Action on the Destitution.

ANOTHER week of activity among the destitute in the great drought belt of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, while it has brought relief to many thousands of hapless families, has disclosed to the workers any new scenes of suffering. Every ay has multiplied the appeals for aid that me with the energy of despair from homes hich the grim shadow of starvation has arkened for many weeks past. This is ue not only of the Western counties of ebraska and Kansas, but also of Colo- do, and that portion of the drought belt at traverses Oklahoma and South Dako- . Our whole land has been stirred in sym- athy with the cry of distress, and Chris- an people everywhere have given of their ibstance to feed and clothe the sufferers. lready $20,000 have been raised by the aders of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and ast quantities of clothing have been sent the stricken States from our Supply De ts in New York, while nearly 400 Volun- er Distributors have been personally por- oing out the advances made from the elief Fund the form money or d. Our test con- gnment of e railroad r-loads of othing—er 1300 oxes and arrels, ag- rega ting ,000 gar- ents—sup- lied all resent eeds of at descrip- on in Ne- raska and ansas. But he greater nd pressing eed of food r man and east has een only bated in art. There re appeals om very any sec- ons where o relief has et reached. Ve trust, owever, ith the ontinued enerous co- eration of ur friends the East, hat before any days, may be uthfully claimed that no readily acces- ible point in any of the States named as a single deserving case of real desti- tution still unaided. The aid already ren- ered has been the means under Providence f saving many hundreds of human lives, nd rescuing thousands from a misery such s those who never felt the pangs of want and starvation can never know. It is a work which the Great Father has laid upon the hearts of his children, and in the prosecution of which they will not falter, even if it should lead—as it has already done—to a field of duty far wider than was at first anticipated.

It is with this object in view—to make the great trust confided in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by its readers as efficacious and far-reaching as possible—that Dr. Klopsch is now in the West, counseling with the State and local relief committees, and with Governors and other officials. Thus far, in addition to $5000 distributed through our volunteers, and otherwise, he has placed with Manager Ludden's State Committee in Lincoln $5000, to be expended through that committee's agents under Dr. Klopsch's direction. The $500 given for tea, coffee, and sugar for the aged and invalid sufferers in that State, the $1000 for the G. A. R.; the like sum to the "Omaha World-Herald" and the $1000 to be expended by the Rev. G. W. Sharp, are all being economically administered, and Pastor Huntington's committee, which has charge of a very large district, is doing good work with the $1000 appropriated for that particular field.

Until now, practically the only help received in Nebraska has come from religious sources. A gentleman in Lincoln expressed the opinion of thousands of others when he said, "I never believed in churches. I could not see that they had any particular or great mission. I am satisfied that I was mistaken. I now believe in God and the mission of the Church."

From Nebraska, Dr. Klopsch proceeded to Colorado, the condition of the impoverished farmers in a number of counties in that State being quite as serious as in Kansas or Nebraska. At Denver, he had a pleasant interview with Gov. McIntyre, who expressed his cordial approval of the relief movement and added that he would cheerfully co-operate, officially and otherwise. The Denver "Republican," the leading newspaper of the State, is fully alive to the existence of widespread distress and has opened its columns for a Relief Fund, which is headed by a contribution of $1,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the "Republican" also giving a substantial contribution to the cause. Local relief committees will be appointed in the distressed counties, the work organized and the same system of distribution adopted which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has followed with good results in Kansas and Nebraska. Several car-loads of clothing and supplies will be forwarded to Colorado for distribution in the eastern strip of counties, where the greatest suffering prevails.

State Senator Painter, representing Sedgwick, Washington, Phillips and Yuma counties, reports a condition of affairs prevailing there similar to that in Nebraska. The people have borne their privations patiently and suffered in silence; but at last their burden of wretchedness has grown intolerable and they are appealing for help. Colorado, he believes, however, can be depended on to take care of her own, when the relief movement is once fairly started. Meanwhile, the need there is urgent and the calls for help quite as moving as any that have yet been received.

"No one can travel over the plains," Dr. Klopsch telegraphs, "and see the present condition of these people without being convinced that the half of their story of destitution and hopelessness has not been told, and that the worst part of their terrible experience is yet to come."

Before he left Denver, the relief movement was thoroughly organized there. In speaking of the progress of the relief work thus far, Dr. Klopsch makes this statement in the "Denver Republican:"

"Nebraska is now fully supplied. By that I mean that so far as it is possible to ascertain, all the immediate wants have been satisfied and the people have food and clothing for their present needs. But in two months the real pinch will come . . . When the present supplies have all been exhausted, instead of 30,000 people in want, there will be 100,000 people starving. I speak calmly from what I and my agents have personally seen in a tour of investigation. There will be suffering past telling in April. I talked with citizens of all classes, particularly farmers."

The Metropolitan Pulpit.

A CALL TO OUTSIDERS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, New York. Text: John 10: 16: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

THERE is no monopoly in religion. The grace of God is not a little property that we may fence off and have all to ourselves. It is not a king's park at which we look through barred gate-way, wishing that we might go in and see the deer and the statuary, and pluck the flowers and fruits in the royal conservatory. No, it is the Father's orchard, and everywhere there are bars that we may let down and gates that we may swing open.

In my boyhood, next to the country school-house, there was an orchard of apples, owned by a very lame man, who, although there were apples in the place perpetually decaying, and by scores and scores of bushels, never would allow any of us to touch the fruit. One day, in the sinfulness of a nature inherited from our first parents, who were ruined by the same temptation, some of us invaded that orchard; but soon retreated, for the man came after us at a speed reckless of making his lameness worse, and cried out: "Boys, drop those apples, or I'll set the dog on you!"

"Well, my friends, there are Christian men who have the Church under severe guard. There is fruit in this orchard for the whole world; but they have a rough and unsympathetic way of accosting outsiders, as though they had no business here, though the Lord wants them all to come and take the largest and ripest fruit on the premises. Have you an idea that because you were baptized at thirteen months of age and because you have all your life been under hallowed influences, that therefore you have a right to one whole side of the Lord's table, spreading yourself out and taking up the entire room? I tell you no. You will have to haul in your elbows, for I shall place on either side of you those whom you never expected would sit there; for, as Christ said to his favored people long ago, so he says to you and to me: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

MacDonald, the Scotchman, has four or five dozen head of sheep. Some of them are browsing on the heather, some of them are lying down under the trees, some of them are in his yard; they are scattered around in eight or ten different places. Cameron, his neighbor, comes over and says: "I see you have thirty sheep; I have just counted them." "No," says MacDonald, "I have a great many more sheep than that. Some are here, and some are elsewhere. They are scattered all around about. I have four or five thousand in my flocks. Other sheep I have,which are not in this fold."

So Christ says to us. Here is a knot of Christians and there is a knot of Christians, but they make up a small part of the flock. Here is the Episcopal fold, the Methodist fold, the Lutheran fold, the Congregational fold, the Presbyterian fold, the Baptist and the Pedo-Baptist fold, the only difference between these last two being the mode of sheep-washing; and so they are scattered all over; and we come with our statistics, and say there are so many thousands of the Lord's sheep; but Christ responds: "No, no; you have not seen more than one out of a thousand of my flock. They are scattered all over the earth.'Other sheep I have which are not of this fold.'"

Christ, in my text, was prophesying the conversion of the Gentiles with as much confidence as though they were already converted, and he is now, in the words of my text, prophesying the coming of a great multitude of outsiders that you never supposed would come in, saying to you and saying to me: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

In the first place, I remark, that the heavenly Shepherd will find many of his sheep among the non-church-goers. There are congregations where they are all Christians, and they seem to be completely finished, and they remind one of the skeleton-leaves which, by chemical preparation, have had all the greenness and verdure taken off them, and are left cold, and white, and delicate, nothing wanting but a glass case to put over them. The minister of Christ has nothing to do with such Christians but to come once a week, and with ostrich feather dust off the accumulation of the last six days, leaving them bright and crystalline as before. But the other kind of a Church is an armory, with perpetual sound of drum and fife, gathering recruits for the Lord of hosts. We say to every applicant: "Do you want to be on God's side, the safe side and the happy side? If so, come in the armory and get equipped. Here is a bath in which to be cleansed. Here are sandals to put upon your feet. Here is a helmet for your brow. Here is a breast-plate for your heart. Here is a sword for your right arm, and yonder is the battle-field. Quit yourselves like men!"

There are some here, who say: "I stopped going to church ten or twenty years ago." My brother, is it not strange that you should be the first man I should talk to to-day? I know all your case; I know it very well, You have not been accustomed to come into religious assemblage, but I have a surprising announcement to make to you: you are going to become one of the Lord's sheep. "Ah," you say, "it is impossible. You don't know how far I am from anything of that kind." I know all about it. I have wandered up and down the world, and I understand your case. I have a still more startling announcement to make in regard to you: you are not only going to become one of the Lord's sheep, but you will become one to-day. You will stay after this service to be talked with about your soul. People of God, pray for that man! That is the only use for you here. I I shall not break off so much as a crumb for you, Christians, in this sermon, for I am going to give it all to the outsiders. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

When the "Atlantic" went to pieces on Mars' Rock, and the people clambered upon the beach, why did not that heroic minister of the Gospel, of whom we have all read, sit down and take care of those men on the beach, wrapping them in flannels, kindling fire for them, seeing that they got plenty of food? Ah, he knew that there were others who would do that. He says: "Yonder are men and women freezing in the rigging of that wreck. Boys, launch the boat!" And now I see the oar-blades bend under the strong pull; but before they reached the rigging a woman was frozen and dead. She was washed off, poor thing! But he says: "There is a man to save;" and he cries out: "Hold on five minutes longer, and I will save you. Steady! Steady! Give me your hand. Leap into the life-boat. Thank God, he is saved!" So there are those here to-day who are safe on the shore of God's mercy. I will not spend any time with them at all; but I see there are some who are freezing in the rigging of sin, and surrounded by perilous storms. Pull away, my lads! Let us reach them! Alas! one is washed off and gone. There is one more to be saved. Let us push out for that one. Clutch the rope. Oh! dying man, clutch it as with a death-grip. Steady, now, on the slippery places. Steady. There! Saved! Saved! Just as I thought. For Christ has declared that there are some still in the breakers who shall come ashore. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

Christ commands his ministers to be fishermen, and when I go fishing I do not want to go among other churches, but into the wide world, not sitting along Hohokus Creek, where eight or ten other persons are sitting with hook and line, but, like the fishermen of Newfoundland, sailing off and dropping net away outside, forty or fifty miles from shore. Yes, there are non-church-goers here who will come in. Next Sabbath they will be here again, or in some better church. They are this moment being swept into Christian associations. Their voice will be heard in public prayer. They will die in peace, their bed surrounded by Christian sympathies, and to be carried out by devout men to be buried, and on their grave be chiseled the words: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." And on Resurrection day you will get up with the dear children you have already buried and with your Christian parents who have already won the palm. And all that grand and glorious history begins this hour. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

I remark again, the Heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many of his sheep among those who are positive rejectors of Christianity. I do not know how you came to reject Christianity. It may have been through hearing Theodore Parker preach, or through reading Renan's"Life of Jesus," or through the infidel talk of some young man in your store. It may have been through the trickery of some professed Christian man who disgusted you with religion. I do not ask you how you became so; but you frankly tell me that you do reject it. You do not believe that Christ is a Divine being, although you admit that he was a very good man. You do not believe that the Bible was inspired of God, although you think there are some very fine things in it. You believe that the Scriptural description of Eden was only an allegory. There are fifty things that I believe that you do not believe. And yet you are an accommodating man. Everybody that knows you says that of you. If I should ask you to do a kindness for me, or if any one else should ask of you a kindness, you would do it. Now, I have a kindness to ask of you to-day. It is something that will cost you nothing and will give me great delight. I want you by experiment to try the power of Christ's religion. If I should come to you, and you were very sick, and doctors had given you up, and said there was no chance for you, and I should take out a bottle, and say: "Here is a medicine that will cure you; it has cured fifty people, and it will cure you." You would say: "I have no confidence in it." I would say: "Won't you take it to oblige me?" "Well," you would say, "if it's any accommodation to you, I'll take it." My friend, will you be just as accommodating in matters of religion? There are some of you who have found out that this world cannot satisfy your soul. You are like the man who told me one Sabbath after the service was over, "I have tried this world and found it an insufficient portion. Tell me of something better." You have come to that. You are sick for the need of Divine medicament. Now I come and tell you of a Physician who will cure you, who has cured hundreds and hundreds who were sick as you are. "Oh," you say, "I have no confidence in him." But will you not try him? Accommodate me in this matter; oblige me in this matter; just try him. I am very certain he will cure you. You reply: "I have no especial confidence in him, but if you ask me as a matter of accommodation, introduce him." So I do introduce him—Christ, the Physician, who has cured more blind eyes, and healed more ghastly wounds, and bound up more broken hearts than all the doctors since the time of Æsculapius. That Divine Physician is here. Are you not ready to try him? Will you not, as a pure matter of experiment, try him, and state your case before him this hour? Hold nothing back from him. If you cannot pray, if you do not know how to pray any other way, say, "O Lord Jesus Christ, this is a strange thing for me to do. I know nothing about the formulas of religion. These Christian people have been talking so long about what thou canst do for me, I am ready to do whatever thou commandest me to do. I am ready to take whatever thou commandest me to take. If there be any power in religion, as these people say, let me have the advantage of it." Will you try that experiment now? I do not at this point of my discourse say that there is anything in religion; but I simply say, try it—try it. Do not take my counsel or the counsel of any clergyman, if you despise clergymen. Perhaps we may be talking professionally; perhaps we may be prejudiced in the matter; perhaps we may be hypocritical in our utterances; perhaps our advice is not worth taking. Then take the counsel of some very respectable laymen, as John Milton, the poet; as William Wilberforce, the statesman; as Isaac Newton, the astronomer; as Robert Boyle, the philosopher; as Locke, the metaphysician. They never preached or pretended to preach; and yet putting down, one his telescope, and another his parliamentary scroll, and another his electrician's wire, they all declare the adaptedness of Christ's religion to the wants and troubles of the world. If you will not take the recommendation of ministers of the Gospel, then take the recommendation of highly respectable laymen Oh men, sceptical and struck through with unrest, would you not like to have some of the peace which broods over our souls to-day? I know all about your doubts. I have have been through them all. I have gone through all the curriculum. I have doubted whether there is a God, whether Christ is God. I have doubted whether the Bible was true; I have doubted the immortality of the soul; I have doubted my own existence I have doubted everything, and yet, out of that hot desert of doubt I have come into the broad, luxuriant, sunshiny land of Gospel hope, and peace, and comfort; and so have confidence in preaching to you and asking you to come in. However often you may have spoken against the Bible or however much you may have caricatured religion, step ashore from that rocking and tumultuous sea. If you go home to-day and hering to your infidelities, you will not sleep one wink. You do not want your children to come up with your scepticism. You can not afford to die in that midnight darkness can you? If you do not believe in anything else, you believe in love—a father's love, a mother's love, a wife's love, a child's love. Then let me tell you that God loves you more than them all. Oh, you must come in. You will come in. The great heart of Christ aches to have you come in, and Jesus this very moment—whether you sit or stand—looks into your eyes and says: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

Again I remark, that the heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many sheep among those who have been flung out by habit. It makes me sad to see Christian people give up a prodigal as lost. There are those who talk as though the grace of God were a chain of forty or fifty links, and before they had run out, there was nothing to touch the depth of a very bad case. If they were hunting and got off the track of the deer, they would look longer among the brakes and bushes for the lost game than they have been looking for that lost sheep. People tell us that if a man have delirium tremens twice, he cannot be reclaimed; that after a woman has sacrificed her integrity she cannot be restored. The Bible has distinctly intimated that the Lord Almighty is ready to pardon four hundred and nine times; that is, seventy times seven. There are men before the throne of God who have wallowed in every kind of sin; but, saved by the grace of Jesus, and washed in his blood, they stand there radiant now. There are those who plunged into the very lowest of all the hells in New York, who have for the tenth time been lifted up, and finally, by the grace of God, they stand in heaven gloriously rescued by the grace promised the chief of sinners. I want to tell you at God loves to take hold of a very bad ıse. When the Church casts you off, and hen the club-room casts you off, and when ɔciety casts you off, and when business ssociates cast you off, and when father ısts you off, and when mother casts you f, and when everybody casts you off, our first cry for help will bend the Eternal od clear down into the ditch of your suf- ring and shame.

The Good Templars cannot save you, al- ough they are a grand institution. The ons of Temperance cannot save you, al- ough they are mighty for good. Signing e temperance pledge cannot save you, al- ough I believe in it. Nothing but the ace of the Eternal God can save you, and at will if you will throw yourself on it. here is a man in this house who said to e: "Unless God helps me I cannot be de- ered. I have tried everything, sir; but ow I have got in the habit of prayer, and hen I come to a drinking saloon I pray at God will take me safe past, and I pray ıtil I am past. He does help me." For ery man given to strong drink there are ores of traps set; and when he goes out business to-morrow, he will be in infinite ril, and no one but the everywhere present od can see that man through. O! they lk about the catacombs of Naples, and the ıtacombs of Rome, and the catacombs of gypt — the burial places under the city here the dust of a great multitude lies; but tell you New York has its catacombs, and oston its catacombs, and Philadelphia its ıtacombs. They are the underground staurants, full of dead men's bones and l uncleanness. Young man, you know God help you. There is no need of ɔing into the art gallery to see in the skil- l sculpture that wonderful representation a man and his sons wound around with rpents. There are families represented in is house that are wrapped in the martyr- ɔm of fang and scale and venom—a living aocoon of ghastliness and horror. What e you to do? I am not speaking into the r. I am talking to hundreds of men who ust be saved by Christ's Gospel or never ved at all. What are you going to do? Do not put your trust in bromide of po- ssium, or in Jamaica ginger, or anything at apothecaries can mix. Put your trust ly in the Eternal God, and he will see ou through. Some of you do not have mptations every day. It is a periodic mptation that comes every six weeks, or very three months, when it seems as if the owers of darkness kindle around about our tongue the fires of the pit. It is well ough, at such a time, as some of you do, seek medical counsel; but your first and ost importunate cry must be to God. If e fiends will drag you to the slaughter, ake them do it on your knees. O God! ow that the paroxysm of thirst is coming gain upon that man, help him! Fling ack into the pit of hell the fiend that as- ults his soul this moment. Oh! my eart aches to see men go on in this fearful ruggle without Christ.

There are in this house those whose ands so tremble from dissipation that they an hardly hold a book; and yet I have to ll you that they will yet preach the Gos- el, and on communion days carry around onsecrated bread, acceptable to everybody, ecause of their holy life, and their conse- rated behavior. The Lord is going to ave you. Your home has got to be re- uilt. Your physical health has got to be estored. Your worldly business has got to be reconstructed. The church of God is oing to rejoice over your discipleship. Other sheep I have which are not of this old."

While I have hope for all prodigals, here are some people in this house whom I ive up. I mean those who have been hurch-goers all their life, who have main- tined outward morality, but who, notwith- anding twenty, thirty, forty years of hristian advantages, have never yielded heir heart to Christ. They are Gospel ardened. I could call their names now, and if they would rise up they would rise up in scores. Gospel hardened! A sermon has no more effect upon them than the shining moon on the city pavement. As Christ says: "The publicans and harlots will go into the kingdom of God before them." They have resisted all the import- unity of Divine mercy, and have gone, during these thirty years, through most powerful earthquakes of religious feeling, and they are farther away from God than ever. After awhile they will lie down sick, and some day it will be told that they are dead. No hope!

But I turn to outsiders with a hope that thrills through my body and soul. "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold." You are not Gospel hardened. You have not heard or read many sermons during the last few years. As you came in to-day everything was novel, and all the services are suggestive of your early days. How sweet the opening hymn sounded in your ears, and how blessed is this hour. Every- thing suggestive of heaven. You do not weep, but the shower is not far off. You sigh, and you have noticed that there is al- ways a sigh in the wind before the rain falls. There are those here who would give anything if they could find relief in tears. They say: "Oh, my wasted life! Oh! the bitter past! Oh the graves over which I have stumbled! Whither shall I fly? Alas for the future! Everything is dark—so dark, so dark. God help me! God pity me!" Thank the Lord for that last ut- terance. You have begun to pray, and when a man begins to pe- tition, that sets all heav- en flying this way, and God steps in and beats back the hounds of temptation to their kennel, and around about the poor wound- ed soul put the covert of his pardon- ing mercy. Hark! I hear something something fall. What was that? It is the bars of the fence around the sheep-fold. The shepherd lets them down, and the hunted sheep of the mountain bound in; some of them their fleece torn with the brambles, some of them their feet lame with the dogs; but bounding in. Thank God! "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."

MRS. HALL.
Widow of Dr. W. J. Hall, and Physician of Women's Hospital at Seoul.

"THE SAILOR'S FOUR ANCHORS."

THE night is dark, yet God, our God
Is here, and in command;
And sure are we when morning breaks
We shall be at the land;

And since we know that darkness is
To him as sunniest ray,
We'll cast the anchor, "Patience" out
And wish, but wait, for day.

Though fierce the storm, the winds and waves
Within his hand are held;
And trusting to "Omnipotence,"
Our fears are quickly quelled.

If wrecked we're in his faithful grasp,
We'll trust him, tho' he slay;
So letting go the anchor, "Faith,"
We'll wish, but wait for day.

All through the moments, dreary, long,
We'll rest upon the Lord;
We'll muse on his eternal years
And feast upon his Word.

His promises so rich! so great
Are our support and stay
We'll drop the anchor, "Hope" ahead
And wish, but wait, for day.

Faithful Unto Death.

Personal Recollections of Dr. W. J. Hall's Work on the Battle-field of Pyeng Yang and in the Homes of Korea by his Friend and Companion, Dr. Samuel A. Moffet of Seoul.

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have as I know been interested in the pioneer work of Dr. Hall in the north of Korea as I have seen him writing his letters for the paper. They consequently will appreciate a few words of his last earthly work for the Master. Probably in his last letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he told of his expectation to return to his work in Pyeng Yang in company with Mr. Lee and myself. We reached Pyeng Yang soon after the great battle fought between the Japanese and Chinese there; and for over a month we were able to remain re- assuring the frightened Koreans, looking after our interests there, preaching the Gospel and healing the sick and wounded. Dr. Hall was busy from morning till night attending the sick, directing his men, re- establishing his school for boys and hold- ing services every evening with the Ko- reans. It was his privilege to see some of the first fruits of his labors, and at this time he examined a class of six applicants who had received instruction through several months. Four of these he baptized as he received them into the Church of Christ. The Lord was especially gracious to him in giving him this privilege as his last work in that city where sin and Satan had such a strong- hold. It was with greatest joy he praised the Lord on that Sunday for having al- lowed him to see the evi- dence of faith in the hearts of these men. Shortly after this Dr. Hall began to feel the effects of his untiring application to the physical and spiritual needs of this people, who had taken such a strong hold on his heart's affec- tion. This to- gether with the exposure of the past year in his numer- ous visits to Pyeng Yang, had left him without sufficiently strong constitution to withstand the dreadfully unhealthy condition of the atmosphere in and around this city which had been the battle-field. The decaying bodies of men, horses and cattle were so numerous that in whichever direction we went we came across them constantly, so that the atmos- phere was foul beyond all expression. We all suffered from malaria and as this seemed to have taken more serious hold up- on Dr. Hall, we arranged to leave for Seoul by Japanese transport. Through the courtesy of officials we were able to do this and after going down the Ta Tong river some forty miles we embarked on board a transport carrying six hundred sick soldiers who were suffering from dysentery and va- rious fevers. We had a safe voyage and when we reached Chemulpo all thought the doctor had about recovered from his fever, but the sequel shows that he had contract- ed typhus fever on the transport. After a day in Chemulpo in which he seemed fair- ly well again, his fever went up and con- tinued to rise while we awaited the arrival of the small river steamer upon which we took passage for Seoul.

Leaving in the afternoon, by dark we had reached a point opposite Kang Hoa isl- and where we struck a rock and nearly cap- sized. All efforts to free the steamer were futile so there was nothing for us to do but to get Dr. Hall on shore, make him as com- fortable as possible in a Korean hut and then seek for a junk. The junk we secured at daybreak, and after a slow journey reached Seoul the next morning. Here, in the hands of his wife and with all the care the doctors could give him, we hoped he would recover,—but the Lord had higher service for him and he left us on Saturday, Nov. 24th, entering into his reward.

Short as was his service in Korea—three years—none had been more faithful and no one was more ripe for heaven than he. It seems to us that in recognition of his fideli- ty and his rare consecration, the Master has called him to a higher place and a more glorious service. Well do I remember the calm assurance with which he left it all with the Lord, as we talked of the proba- bility of his going. He remarked that he had been willing to leave home when the Master called him to Korea, to leave Seoul when he was called to Pyeng Yang and that he was willing and ready to go to oth- er service on high if the Master called him from earth. Dr. Hall was a man of great faith, great love and great humility. His prayers were an inspiration to us. His love for the Koreans was such that he exercised a great influence upon all with whom he came in contact. His love for children was especially noteworthy, and whether in New York or in the foreign community in Seoul or among the Koreans in Pyeng Yang, the children were always around him and al- ways occupied a large share in his plans for work. When beginning his work in Pyeng Yang he was not satisfied until he had secured a school teacher, gathered a number of boys and established a school so that he could at once influence the children and win them to Christ. Great was his joy when one of these boys had induced his parents to give up spirit worship and allow him to kneel in the midst of them of- fering prayer to the only living and true God. This boy he received into the Church and no privilege the Master gave him was the source of greater pleasure. In the com- munity Dr. Hall was known as a thorough- ly sincere, earnest Christian, whose love for all led him to be continually serving others He has been a blessing to his fellow-work- ers, a blessing to the Koreans and an influ- ence in the establishment of the Church of Christ in Korea.

As one most intimately acquainted with him in his work in Pyeng Yang, it is my privilege to bear witness to his fidelity, to the solid character of his work and to the great hold which he had upon the hearts of the people who intuitively recognized his great sympathetic love for them. May the Lord send us many more such missionaries.

His wife, who was so earnestly laboring with him and who had endured not only the hardship of service with him in Pyeng Yang, but also the hardship of separation from him during part of that work, has de- cided to return to America for a few years. Our prayers and our sympathy go with her in the hope that she may be able to re- turn and carry on their work so well begun.

TEACHING IN LIVINGSTONIA.

In a recent interview published in an English journal, the following facts relative to the mission in Livingstonia are given by Mr. Charles Stuart, who has been laboring there, but is now at his home in Aberdeen on furlough:

At the beginning of 1889 I went out to Livingstonia in connection with the Free Church Mission. I was sent on my ar- rival in Africa to Njuyu, one of the stations of the Livingstonia Mission, some three days' journey to the north-west of Lake Nyasa, from Bandawe, the headquarters of the Mission. I went to assist Dr. Elmslie, my department being school work. When I arrived there in 1889, there was one mis- sion station, and one school, attended by about one hundred children, with four na- tive teachers. I took charge of the school work. When I left the district last May, on furlough, we had three stations, with five European workers. There are eight or ten schools, attended by about a thousand chil- dren, with thirty-six native assistant teach- ers, male and female. These assistants are taken from the most advanced and most hopeful students, and the great majority of them are professing Christians. In 1890 the first two converts in the Agoni tribe (among whom we work), were baptized at Njuyu. Now there is a little Christian community there. A few weeks before I left I was present at a service where eight natives were admitted into church fellow- ship, and twenty-one of us sat together at the Lord's Supper—seventeen African men and women and four Europeans.

CHRIST AND THE BLIND MAN.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 24. John 9: 1-11. Golden Text 9:5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

NATURE always manifests itself. When God created the animal kingdom, he made "the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind." (Gen. 1: 24.) The camel never could become a sheep, nor a horse become a goat, each family of creatures remained as it was created,

"After His Kind."

And equally so the natural man is never changed, but remains "after his kind," and the divine nature also is after its kind. It was not the divine nature which led the disciples when they saw a man blind from his birth, begging at the gates of the temple, to say, "Rabbi, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he should be born blind?"

Jesus was passing out from the temple, where he had been teaching holy truths, incomprehensible to the Scribes and Pharisees, and most unacceptable to them; and they and taken up "stones to cast at him." But he "hid himself (or R.V., margin, was hidden) and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by." (John 8: 5, 9.) Hidden from his enemies, but not hidden from a blind beggar! Shielded from those who sought his life and yet, at the very same moment at the disposal of the beggar whom his own disciples despise! This was a spirit and nature far removed from that which led to the question of the disciples. Oh, it is a deep humiliation when a child of God comes in contact with any fellow creature, even the most undeserving, without being in some way made a blessing to him. Under any circumstances, however unwise and really unkind it may be in some cases to give money to such, we can always take them on our hearts in prayer.

To the disciples' question, spoken in a spirit of judgment and of conscious superiority, Jesus answered, "Neither did this man sin, nor his parents; but that the work of God should be made manifest in him. We must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work!" It was a quiet but forcible reproof which does not appear in the authorized version. To the Son of Man the presence of the persistent beggar was an opportunity, not for unkind and disparaging remarks or questions, but for doing the works of him that sent him; in which he gives his disciples their part; as though to imply that their suspicion and condemnation of the man were not the works of him that sent him. Let us not lose the lesson. Every occurence in every day of our lives is an opportunity to work the works of God; if instead, we are working the works of self, then the light which is in us is darkness.

"While [or when, R.V.] I am in the world, I am the light of the world." To say with Jesus was to do. What should light do when darkness was manifest? Without waiting to find any merit in the blind man, anything which could possibly recommend him, he whose vocation was to give light took in hand to heal him. He did not repeat his method with any other blind man; but simply spat on the ground, made clay of the spittle, anointed the eyes of the blind man, and sent him to the pool of Siloam to wash. All he required of him was trust and obedience. These things he found in the very man whom the disciples had despised, and the man returned with opened eyes, seeing. The light had shone into the darkness, and light had broken through it. Light had conquered darkness.

But how would this "work of God" affect him who had wrought it? The rulers and the teachers of the people were incensed against him: how would they take this miracle? It could not be kept quiet, the blind man was known all over Jerusalem. First, the neighbors began to talk: they doubted if it were he, and when he himself asserted his identity, and they demanded an account of the wonderful work which was done on him, he frankly told them how "the Man that is called Jesus" had anointed his eyes, and sent him to the pool of Siloam to wash, and he had come back, seeing. How strange is human nature! One might have expected that the neighbors would have been overjoyed at the healing of one among them, and such a healing, But Jesus had done it, and the name of Jesus was already well known as one held in disfavor in high quarters, and human selfishness, the mean selfishness which seeks its own at whatever cost to others, led the neighbors to calculate how the healing of the man would touch their interests. They might lose much ground with the Pharisees, perhaps lose some work which might bring them in a good deal, if they should appear to take the part of the Prophet of Nazareth, whose fame was on the decline. So to make sure of their position these mean men determined, at all costs, to let the Pharisees know what had happened, and so secure themselves by playing into their hands.

They brought the man to the Pharisees, and told the story. These, also had their own ends to serve, and neither they nor his neighbors sympathized with the man, whose opened eyes had placed him in a new world. They discovered that the worker of the miracle was not of God because the man was healed on the Sabbath; but some differed and enquired, "How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles?" [or signs.] They then tried to get rid of the matter in another way, and threw discredit on the miracle by suggesting that the whole thing was a fraud, that the man had never been blind at all. Oh, the miserable subtefuges of man to get rid of the miracle of God! Adam and Eve are not alone in the desire to get away from God; Jonah has many companions in his attempt to run away from God; the most externally religious people will be quite angry if one tells them of something in which God has drawn nigh; if he has signally answered prayer, has healed the sick, has given a precise direction and so has drawn nigh to man. They want to keep him a God afar off, too great and too high to interfere in the ordinary life of man. They will give him gifts, perform devotions, penances, anything rather than let him manifestly appear in and interfere with their lives: to them he is an idea, not a real, living, loving Father.

The Pharisees entered into the matter as though they were judging a criminal case in a court of law. They called the parents of the man into court as witnesses of his birth-blindness, which, although in terror of being cast out of the synagogue, they proved beyond a doubt. What was it which led these Pharisees to look on such a work of power and love, wrought by him whose life was one of love and mercy, as though it were an evil thing? It was that the "Light of the world" was shining into their lives, and making visible the darkness and the evil; their selfishness and meanness, their hypocrisy and unreality. They could not bear the holy light of Jesus shining into every secret purpose and motive—bringing it to light by his own life lived among them sometimes without even saying a word. He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil;" while they bound "burdens heavy and grievous to be borne," and laid them on men's shoulders; while they themselves would not "move them with one of their fingers." They were particular to the letter about all manner of outward observances, while he poured out love, and light, and healing, upon all around him; the contrast could not remain unnoticed.

The parents disposed of, the man was called again, and the Pharisees, who could not deny the deed which was done, exhorted him to give the glory of it to God, for, they said, "We know that this man is a sinner." "Whether he be a sinner or not," was the man's rejoinder, "I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." It was an unanswerable testimony: they did not attempt to deny it, but followed up their point that Jesus was a sinner, and in their bitter hatred of Jesus, they sought to draw out from the poor man something that would make him criminate himself, that they might have some ground to excommunicate him. Thus bitter is the human heart against Jesus.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

HEREDITY was a doctrine thoroughly established among the Jews. Every child was familiar with the declaration that God visited the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation. There was also an idea current, probably imported from nations of the East, that people had an existence before this. When therefore, the disciples saw the man born blind, these two ideas found voice in the question: "Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" It was characteristic of Jesus that he turned the question in a new direction. The disciples had assumed that the affliction was a punishment. Jesus says it was not to be regarded as a punishment, but as an opportunity, and immediately proceeds to cure the man. The lesson lies on the surface. In the presence of suffering, the Christlike course is not to speculate about causes, nor to wonder whether the sufferer has brought the affliction on himself, but to do whatever can be done to alleviate the suffering. A second lesson suggested by the incident is, unquestioning obedience. It is remarkable how often in working a miracle Christ required the sufferer to do something. In this case the man was to walk to a certain pool and wash. It may have appeared to him a useless thing to do; it certainly was not necessary, as Christ could have healed him without that, but he did as he was told and received sight. At this day, the way to be delivered from drunkenness, vice and all forms of sin is to believe on Christ. The remedy seems inadequate; we cannot understand how faith can transform character. But it is the way to get it transformed. Those who believe, are delivered. A third lesson is the testimony of experience. The man who had been blind clung to his fact. The learned people tried to confuse him, but he would not be mystified. They said Jesus was a sinner; Jesus had broken the Sabbath; Jesus had no respectable people among his followers. The once blind man did not care. They reminded him of his own ignorance and taunted him with the sin by which their abominable doctrine accounted for his blindness, but he could not be moved. They might speculate, draw inferences, condemn, but, one thing he knew, that whereas he was blind, now he saw. He might be ignorant, but he knew that one thing—a thing he was quite sure about; a thing he could not be argued out of; the most momentous thing to him in the world. So Christianity stands on the testimony of experience. Infidels have assailed it and ridiculed it; sceptics have raised difficulties and pointed out discrepencies; scientists have pronounced it unphilosophical; but it has held its ground, because of the men who could say, "I know." The men whose lives and characters it has transformed could declare themselves living witnesses to its power like the man who said, whether these are as you allege I know not; "one thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see."

That the works of God should be made manifest. Why am I made to suffer so terribly?" is often asked, and the sufferer looks over his past life to see what sin he can have committed to bring chastisement upon him. It would often be more profitable to take a different view — that which Christ took of the man's blindness. The affliction may be sent for a purpose not as a punishment. Many generations of Christians have been comforted and encouraged by a book, entitled, "The Saint's Everlasting Rest." Probably thousands of persons have derived help from it in sorrow, sickness and death. That book would never have been written but for a time of sickness and loneliness. Robert Baxter, the author, was a busy minister, whose time was fully occupied with preaching and pastoral work. He was too busy to write a book. But he was prostrated with severe sickness while at a distance from home, and when none of his friends was near him. He was very lonely with no one to speak to but a dull servant, and his thoughts turned to the land which his physician told him he was approaching. That they might not be too discursive he set them down on paper and they grew into the book which after his recovery was printed. He often said afterward that the world would never have got the book from him if he had not been through that time of sickness and loneliness. So it was that Germany got her Bible from Luther. Shut up in the Wartburg he had the time to translate it which he would not have had at the University.

Washed and came seeing. What a change that must have been for the blind man! Beauty was all around him, but he knew it not until his eyes were opened to see it. A little boy was born blind. At last an operation was performed; the light was let in slowly; when one day his mother led him out of doors, and uncovered his eyes, and for the first time he saw the sky and the earth. "Oh, mother!" he cried, "why didn't you tell me it was so beautiful?" She burst into tears and said, "I tried to tell you, dear, but you could not understand me." So it is when people have been converted. They see beauty and life and joy in religion, of which, before their spiritual eyes were opened, they had no conception.

I am he. It is related of St. Augustin that before his conversion he led a dissipated, vicious life. His boon companions missed him suddenly. He was passing through a severe ordeal. He was seeking salvation and it was very hard for him to accept Christ and give up the world. But he was saved and changed. He came out of his retirement a new man, as devoted to Christ and righteousness as before he had been to pleasure and the world. One day afterward he was in a public square when a beautiful woman whom he was passing without recognition, although in former years she had been his companion in many a revel, called to him reproachfully, "August, it is I." He looked round upon her and said, "But it is not I," telling her that he was changed, and had become a new man in Christ. She listened incredulously and went her way; but Augustine's words were true. His nature had been changed; he was not the Augustine his quondam friends knew.

One thing I know. In the old coaching days, before railroads were made, a young man made a journey in England of eighty miles on the box-seat of a coach. The driver was a taciturn man whom it was difficult to draw into conversation. The young man sitting beside him plied him with questions. As the coach passed some country seat the young man would ask who lived there, and the coachman invariably answered, "I don't know." At last, in desperation, the young man asked, "What do you know?" The coachman looked down at the four spirited horses he was guiding and said grimly, "I know how to drive." That was his business, and it was much in his favor that he knew this. The blind man in the lesson did not profess to understand logic or theology, but he knew one thing, and that was the chief thing to him.

Relief Still Flowing In.

From Colorado, Dr. Klopsch went to Kansas, where the work of relief has been progressing under Mr. Sharp's management. Several car-loads of clothing and supplies, besides money, have already been distributed in that state. Dr. Klopsch met Governor Morrill at Topeka and discussed further relief measures.

Kansas will Help its Own Destitute.

While in Topeka, Dr. Klopsch interviewed the Mayor of that city and also managing editor Hudson of the "Daily Capital." The latter is thoroughly convinced that the destitution in Kansas is very great and warrants the most energetic measures of relief. The "Capital" has accordingly published a stirring appeal, inviting contributions, and opening a Fund for the sufferers in the western counties to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has contributed $1,000 from the general Relief Fund. In the Kansas Senate, a bill appropriating $50,000 for seed for the farmers has been amended by adding $50,000 more for food supplies and fuel for the destitute.

The Governor of the State has appointed a Relief Commission, who have issued an appeal to prosperous Kansans. This appeal, despite the fact that it deprecates the publicity given to the distressed condition of Western Kansas, is a virtual admission of the entire truth of the statements published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which have thus been the means of compelling the State, through its officials, to recognize the existence of destitution, and to do its duty in helping its own poor.

Our prolonged insistence on the existence of destitution makes it impossible for officials longer to conceal the fact, to the shameful disadvantage of the suffering farmers.

Apart from the enormous contributions of money and supplies induced directly and indirectly through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, actually aggregating much more than $100,000 in value, the moral pressure persistently brought to bear on the tardy officials, influenced by railroad, real-estate or bonded interests, ranks this as the leading public benefaction of the day. The whole relief movement now benefitting Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Oklahoma and Northern Texas, in an exceedingly large measure, owes its vitality to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which has awakened churches, young people's societies and Sunday Schools in the smitten States to a realizing sense of their duty.

This wonderful experience has demonstrated the readiness with which the Christian people of this country are prepared to do their share towards helping any very considerable proportion of our population who may be plunged into misfortune and suffering. But it is an experience worthy of emulation and one to be commended to the religious portion of the communities in each individual State.

A Suggestion to the Churches.

It should be the sacred duty of the Christian people of every State, and especially of those who dwell in the prosperous sections, to see that any cases of real distress and destitution within their borders are relieved through the existing religious agencies. Proper organization sustained by sympathetic hearts and willing hands, would enable any State to assume the burden of relieving its own poor without the necessity of calling in outside aid, save in a time of the greatest extremity, such as now prevails in the Western drought-belt. The time has arrived when the people of Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado, by organizing in the manner suggested, should be able to take care of their own destitute in future emergencies. If an organization such as has been suggested can be effected, the need of outside aid will speedily disappear.

Suffering in Oklahoma.

That a great deal of suffering exists in Oklahoma, is evident from the reports received; indeed, the destitution is more marked there at this writing than anywhere else, and much assistance in the shape of food and other supplies, will be needed to enable the unfortunate sufferers to survive the almost arctic winter of that region. The Fund will assist in money and clothing, and it is earnestly hoped that the same generosity that has accomplished so much good in Nebraska and Kansas will be extended by our friends to Oklahoma and Colorado. Any gifts of clothing, therefore, that may be sent in for use there, will be forwarded through the Fund. The near future of these states will fully bear out the worst that has been prognosticated. Kansas, too, still has great need of clothing.

In Nebraska, Manager Ludden is doing the best any man could do in the very trying position in which he is placed. The railroads have cut off free transportation, and even if they had not, it is quite right for him, before making further shipments, to ascertain how well the different stations are supplied. Besides, he is compelled to husband his resources, as the end is not yet in sight.

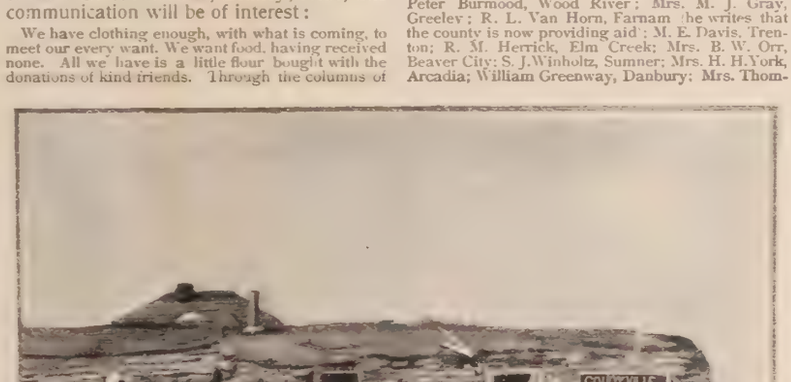
Faithful Workers.

If the whole story of the work of our faithful Volunteer Distributors were told, it would make a most inspiring volume, full of bright examples of integrity, consecration, and love of humanity. Rev. J. C. Irwin, Presbyterian Church, North Platte, Neb., writes:

The $5 received from you early in January was used to buy two pairs of shoes and two sacks of flour for two needy families who live in the northern part of this county, thirty miles from the railroad. I have reason to believe that it did much good, and relieved considerable suffering in those homes. I have received one barrel of clothing, and have distributed it as need appeared. The Relief Committee of this (Lincoln) county have received and distributed a good deal of clothing and some provision. We are not now so much in need of clothing as we are of provision and fuel. We need money very much to buy these.

To readers who have sent contributions to Rev. G. W. Brooks, Lemley, Neb., this communication will be of interest:

We have clothing enough, with what is coming, to meet our every want. We want food, having received none. All we have is a little flour bought with the donations of kind friends. Through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, extend thanks to all.



A POST OFFICE IN THE DESTITUTE BELT OF SOUTH DAKOTA.

Built of sods and occupied also as a Dwelling. From a photograph

Telling of the sympathy that binds the sisterhood of States, Mrs. G. W. Dewey of Gates, Neb., has sent us a poem in which Nebraska thus speaks her thanks to a sister State:

And if ever, sister Georgia,
Such a blight on thee should fall,
May we then be found as ready
To respond unto thy call.

In her letter accompanying the verses, Mrs. Dewey says:

We decided to use half the amount ($10) to relieve the sick. We appreciate the good work the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing, and heartily thank all who have contributed clothing. We have received several barrels and a large box, also several packages and have distributed nearly all. A box from New Bethlehem contained many useful articles which have been distributed to the needy.

Welcoming the Relief.

From Erwin Eddy, Supervisor, Belgrade, Neb., comes this:

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund checks come in, it does one's heart good to see the happy faces. The money has been spent for flour, hominy and other necessaries. I also received a box of clothing, which we are distributing to the best of our ability. Now the greatest need is seed and feed.

Rev. O. A. Buzzell, Juniata, Neb., makes a very gratifying report of relief work accomplished. He has received, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeal, the following sums:

Mrs. C. F. Logan, $10.; Adeline Reebles, $11.; J. C. Brenizer, 5.; Mrs. J. E. Lucas, $10.; Thos. E. Estlack, $5.; H. E. Newman, $5.; G. B. Wray, $5.; I. S. Babcock, $26.; W. B. Bigger, $5.; Edith Nichols, $5.60; Mrs. Hattie E. Parker, $2.; Brought forward, $80.60; E. H. Turner, $1.60; total $91.20. This, in addition to the two drafts from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some of this is sent for the purpose of paying freight on barrels and boxes now on the way. Have received notice of ten barrels, two boxes, and one sack of clothing not yet received, and 650 pounds of flour. Of the cash received, I have given (besides the $2 before reported) to a poor widow, $1.; a family of five children, $1. Sent to County Judge of Logan County, $13, to be used as follows: A widow with two little girls, $5. A sick man, $2.50. A poor man with large family, having lost one leg, not a pensioner, $2.50; another very poor crippled man, having no means of support, $5. The balance is in the bank until I receive the clothing which is on the way, when I expect to go around the field and supply it as I see it most needed.

Grateful for Help.

Chairman Roberts of the Associated Charities, Beaver City, writes:

Allow me to express my gratitude to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for what you are doing for the drouth sufferers of Nebraska. The money and supplies are doing great good and relieving much distress. Any aid you may have to send to this place should be sent to "Associated Charities," Beaver City, Neb. What the people need most are shoes, stockings, and underclothes for children; rice, beans, flour, and such necessaries of life. Our committee went out and found mothers about to bear children, and the mothers without a garment of any kind prepared for the little ones.

In a recent letter, Rev. G. W. Sharp quotes N. S. Lowrie, Chairman of Holt County Relief Commission, as authority for the statement that all the north half of Holt County is destitute. The supervisors did not over-estimate the situation when they reported officially two hundred and fifty families totally destitute. Mr. Sharp has made a tour of part of Holt and King Counties and writes that relief is urgently needed there.

The weather in Nebraska has been of the "blizzard" type, with intense cold and high winds. Everywhere, throughout the State, expressions of gratitude are heard for the relief extended by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. The good work of its Fund contributors is known far and near throughout the State.

Relief Work in Kansas.

In the distressed counties of Western Kansas, the relief work has been progressing splendidly and uninterruptedly during the week and a large number of destitute have been aided. Rev. George W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary, who has distributed over $1,000, has also charge of the distribution of one car load of clothing and provisions sent to each of the following points: Almena, Beloit, Colby, Hill City and Quinter. This will undoubtedly supply all wants in these districts for the time being. We have received many encouraging letters from our Volunteer Distributors in that State. M. Lumpkin writes from Sharon, Kan., that there are a great many destitute there. Mrs. Sarah Paige of Ada, Kan., says that the help rendered through the Fund was "a God-send." She distributed it among the sick and needy. Mrs. W. R. Shirley, Atwood; C. Rinehart, Glasco; Geo. L. Copeland, Nonchalanta; and a number of others also send reports of the work, which is being pushed with energy in every necessitous quarter. Flour, feed and potatoes constitute the main purchases made by the Distributors. Many large families of children and very sick and utterly destitute have been helped by the Fund.

Among the reports received from Distributors in Kansas, are the following:

W. C. H. Marshall, Norton, two families relieved, received one barrel clothing; Rev. D. D. Dodge, Almena, supplied food to several families, some boxes of clothing and provisions received; Joel Turner, Goodland, many needy ones helped, two packages of clothing and some money received, besides the remittance from Relief Fund; H. H. Gane, Wilson, has received several boxes of clothing and some money from outside sources, besides the Fund allowance; relieved a number of needy, says no more help is necessary in his district. E. F. Ham, Quinter; W. R. Christie, Jetmore; J. Rogers, Ransom (received $4.25 from outside donors); Peter Moyer, Ludell; Mrs. C. H. Bruce, Hill City; Mrs. Dora Sparks, Howard; A. F. Lapham, M. D. Kensington; Mrs. A. Kuhn, Stuyvesant; Geo. I. Coaland, Nonchalanta; Wm. Wilson, Ness City; W. A. Picket, Liverpool (comparatively few suffering); D. T. Starrett, Lenora (several families helped); Mary Brown, Cuba; Clara Jellison, Fellville; A. Bennie, Long Island (community taking care of its own poor); George Hubbuck, Cameron (abundant clothing).

Two Counties Relieved.

Judge W. D. Thompson of Minneapolis, Kan., writes that Ottawa county is able to take care of its destitute. President Giffen Culbertson of the Commercial State Bank, Long Island, Kan., says no more help is needed in that district, although the destitution at some points is great.

I purchased dry goods with the Fund remittance which went to fifteen families and gave to over fifty persons a warm, useful article of clothing. This shows how God will prosper his work.—(writes Mrs. Carrie Nation, Medicine Lodge, Kan.

Helping so many almost recalls the days of miracles; but it was only the wise planning of a careful woman. Her letter goes on to tell how it was done:

With the $5 I purchased a bolt of shaker flannel and a job lot of shop-worn hoods and jackets mostly for children, also a hat, two pairs of shoes and some stockings. God bless this his own work to relieve the need of the poor in this place.

Mrs. Doctor of Scandia, Kan., who received money and clothing, relieved twenty-one persons. She writes:

Although there is a great scarcity of money and the closest kind of economy is being practiced, still the actual suffering in our immediate neighborhood is relieved for the present.

"May God bless all the donors," writes Mrs. McFarland, Norton, Kan. "We have received four boxes, a barrel of clothing and $31 in cash. The clothing has been distributed and with the money we have bought shoes, flour and potatoes for the needy families."

From the drouth-stricken districts of Texas, where several Distributors were appointed, we have received letters showing that the relief has been faithfully administered. Lulu Satterfield, Iwawah, Hardeman Co., writes:

Two families were among the beneficiaries of your contribution. One family of six small children, hungry and ragged children; the other an old gentleman and two motherless children, who were equally destitute. This financial strait will continue until another crop is raised. As I am a teacher in the public schools I am well acquainted with the wants of the people. Food and clothing are both needed; I believe, clothing most.

Three very needy families relieved was the result of Mr. W. L. Sorrell's distributing work at Seagoville, Tex. Mr. K. Vasbinder, photographer, of Elmendorf, also did good work in his district, where there were only four or five families actually destitute. The Texas reports indicate that the distress in that State is not widespread and is quickly being lessened by active relief work.

Money contributions to the Relief Fund are acknowledged on next page and gifts of clothing, etc., on page 111. A notable recent contribution was fifteen barrels containing six hundred garments from Southington, Conn. A. Ashmun Kelly of Malvern, Pa., packed his ninth barrel last week. A handsome contribution of new clothing was received from Sonneborn & Co., 740 Broadway, New York.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

JAPANESE TEMPLES.

ONE of the most fashionable resorts in Japan is Nikko, which is situated in the heart of the central mountain system of the country about ninety miles north of Tokio. An American traveler who visited the place a few years ago, describes it as a tangled maze of glens, wild ravines, cascades, woods, temples, and mountain torrents. The shrines are unparalleled for symmetry of proportion, elegance and variety of design and richness of lacquering. They are hidden in forests on the side of the mountain and are built on terraces about seven feet above each other and connected by flights of stone steps. At each terrace is a magnificent gate, that of the third terrace flanked on each side by a graceful belfry in which are hung the great bells for which Japan is noted. The temples were erected in honor of two Japanese potentates of the seventeenth century, Iyeyasu and his grandson Iyemitsu who are buried on the mountain at Nikko. They were the representatives, and their time the culmination of the system of feudalism which has now utterly passed away. The memory of them is, however, imperishable while the temples and shrines retain their beauty. They are remarkable for the absence of any of the Buddhist images which abound in other temples in Japan. The strange religious system of Japan has applied them, and the temples appear to have been erected with the idea of the departed spirit inhabiting them, as the great potentates lived in palaces in their lives. Incense is burned, women dancers perform their sacred dances, and monks chant their prayers in the several buildings, and all is done with due pomp and solemnity. Pilgrims still go to the shrines to pray and to make their offerings, for Iyeyasu and Iyemitsu are duly enrolled among the gods of Japan and are supposed still to have power to bless and help their worshippers. It is sad that this instinct of worship should be directed to idols and the spirits of dead heroes for it is right in itself and its absence is the most deplorable thing in our modern civilization. Our difficulty is not that men worship the wrong objects but that they do not worship anything, though the Being whose name and attributes are revealed to them in the Bible is infinitely worthy of supreme adoration and service. (Rev. 22: 9.)

MORTUARY TEMPLE AND BELFRY ON THE MOUNTAIN AT NIKKO, JAPAN.

Gifts of Skin.

A practical evidence of sympathy and good will has been given to a comrade by the officers and men of a company of the Illinois National Guard. A few weeks ago the wife of one of the officers had a narrow escape of being burned to death. She upset a lighted oil lamp, and in a minute was enveloped in flames. Fortunately, help was at hand and the flames were extinguished, but not until her neck, breast and arms had been severely burned. Since then she has been lying in a critical condition, her injuries refusing to heal. Her physicians at last had recourse to skin-grafting, which had the desired effect. Her husband freely offered his own cuticle for the purpose and six hundred minute pieces were transferred from it to that of his wife. It was considered imprudent to remove more of his skin, but more was needed for the injured lady. In the emergency the whole military company to which he belonged promptly offered themselves, and the offer was accepted. Several hundred pieces of skin have been taken from their arms and applied to the lady's wounds, and she is now well on the way to recovery. She ought to feel very grateful to the husband's comrades. They have given unmistakable proofs of their devotion. Many a man who would give freely of his money or goods for the relief of some one in distress would hesitate, if asked to suffer personal pain that another might regain health. Yet this spirit is the one that should animate every Christian, making him willing to endure pain and hardship, if in that way, souls may be saved. This was the spirit that was in Christ himself, "by whose stripes we are healed." (Isa. 53: 5.)

A Reverse of Fortune.

A singular retribution which has befallen an ambitious woman is reported in the "Lewiston (Me.,) Journal." It recalls a marriage of two popular young persons, which took place twenty years ago. The young man was in a prosperous business at the time and had the brightest prospects of a successful career. His bride had been the belle of the neighborhood and had chosen him out of a number of suitors. She was very pleased with the home he provided for her, as she had reason to be, for he had spent his money lavishly in making it attractive and comfortable. But after a time she grew discontented. She had a passionate desire to be rich and gradually grew to despise her husband because he could not maintain her in the style she thought becoming her station. It was not long before her extravagance brought him to bankruptcy and then she deserted him, procured a divorce and soon afterward married a wealthy man. Her former husband often saw her enjoying the height of her ambition which was to ride in a handsome carriage behind a pair of fine horses. He resumed business and soon was able to retrieve his fortunes. He is to-day one of the most prosperous business men of the district; while his former wife, whose second husband mismanaged his property and came to ruin, is glad to earn a dollar from any one who will give her a job at scrubbing or washing. She knows now that it would have been better for her in a worldly point of view, apart from all considerations of honor and principle, if she had been faithful to her husband in his adversity. The same discovery will be made at last by every one who despises the life of humiliation with Christ and chooses the pleasures of sin which are but for a season. (Heb. 11: 25.)

The North Sea Calamity.

A thrill of horror went through the whole civilized world on January 30, when the news came that the great passenger steamer "Elbe" had gone down with nearly all her passengers and crew. The news of the disaster was brought to Lowestoft, an English port, by a fishing boat which had on board twenty persons whom it had found tossing about on the waves in a frail boat. They came from the "Elbe" of the North German line and they told a story of appalling disaster. The "Elbe" was on her way from Bremen to New York with 155 officers and sailors and 199 passengers, 354 persons in all. About six o'clock on the morning of January 30, when the steamer was only a few miles out from Bremen and when the English coast was about fifty miles away, the lookout on the "Elbe" saw a small steamer approaching. He gave the alarm, but before the course could be changed or the speed checked, the crash came. The little steamer struck the "Elbe" with terrific force near the engine-room and when she backed out, there was a huge hole in the great ship's side through which the water rushed in a torrent. It was evident from the rapidity with which the "Elbe" listed that she must soon founder. The only hope for the people on board lay in the boats. Of these, three were launched. One was swamped as soon as it touched the water, the fate of the second is unknown but it, too, was probably sunk, and the third with its meagre load of twenty lives was picked up by the fishing-sloop. That few boats were launched is probably due to the confusion that ensued after the collision and to the rapidity with which the "Elbe" filled and sank. It is significant that of the twenty persons saved, only one was a woman and fifteen were sailors. The fact confirms the stories of the surviving passengers that the sailors were intent on saving themselves and prevented any one else getting into the boats. It was too dark at the time of the disaster to see the name of the little steamer that worked the mischief. There is no doubt, however, that it was the "Crathie," which left Maasluis for Aberdeen ou the night before the catastrophe and returned the next day with her bow smashed in. The captain admitted that he had been in collision with a steamer. When asked why he did not stay on the scene and try to save some lives, he said that he thought his own vessel was sinking and would go down if he delayed making for port. It was one of those times that test men's souls. The captain of the "Crathie" and the sailors on the "Elbe," who fought for places on the boat, had evidently not attained the higher plane to which Christianity leads men, where they prefer other's welfare to their own. In giving up manliness, honor and magnanimity to retain life they justified Satan's slander of the human race," All that a man hath will he give for his life." (Job 2: 4.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Whole Christian Community in this and other lands suffers a severe loss in the death of Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston, Mass., whose sermons have been published at regular intervals in this journal. A biographical notice of this eminent servant of Christ appears on another page.

The British Museum has Thirty Miles of book shelves and contains over two million books.

The Emperor of Austria Recently Conferred the Silver Cross of Merit upon a young soldier, who, finding that a young sleeping princess had been bitten by a viper, sucked the poison, thus saving her life.

The British Government is Enforcing a stringent prohibition law in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. Any person detected in selling or giving intoxicating liquor to a native is liable to fine and imprisonment.

Rev. E. P. Hammond Has Been Holding meetings at Chatham, Ont. The venerable evangelist still retains his power with the children, and crowds of them attended his services. Some of them wrote him letters of gratitude, which he caused to be published in the Chatham [illegible] Record.

Dr. A. C. Dixon, of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, is holding meetings at Willimantic, Conn. Mr. M. H. Jacobs is assisting him in the musical part of the services.

An Excellent Plan Has Been adopted by the Seventh Presbyterian Church of New York, of which Rev. J. T. Wilds is pastor. It has opened a large house at 46 Ridge Street for the accommodation at low rates of impoverished and homeless men.

Dr. Henry S. Lunn, a Prominent English Methodist minister, is now in this country on a lecture tour. Dr. Lunn believes in a union of churches of all denominations, and has been active in promoting the famous Grindelwald Conferences. He is anxious to interest American Christians in the work of uniting the churches.

Lebanon, Ill., is Enjoying a Remarkable revival. Mrs. Alice Lindly writes that 720 persons have signed cards pledging themselves in Christ's strength to a new life. Rev. W. A. Matthews, pastor of the Baptist Church, baptized 140 new members in one week, which makes 250 who have thus publicly made profession of faith since the meetings commenced.

Rev. R. S. MacArthur's People are making preparations to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate at Calvary Baptist Church, New York. One gratifying feature of the preparations is the complete extinction of the debt on the beautiful edifice. The amount of money raised by the church for philanthropic and religious work increases year by year, and the church records show a steady growth in numbers and new lines of work.

Rev. Wm. F. Davis Has Been again committed to jail for preaching on Boston Common without a permit. He has already served one sentence in jail for this offense. He was fined $20 and the costs of court amounting to $30. Refusing to pay, he was taken to the Charles Street jail. He has now applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the city ordinance is in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

A Bible Conference has been held at Baltimore, Md., under the management of Rev. Geo. C. Needham. Messrs. Erdman, Stroeter, Gabelein, Pollard and Stifler took part in the proceedings. The Christian people of the city have asked Mr. Needham to make the conference an annual arrangement.

Major George A. Hilton has been Holding successful meetings at Canonsbury, Pa. Several churches united in the movement and people came from a circuit of twelve miles to listen to the Evangelist. Many conversions have taken place and many people who were aroused to spiritual concern are now seeking guidance of the ministers of the town.

The London Poor are Suffering Acutely this winter. Mr. Frederick N. Charrington writes to the English Christian Herald: "The distress in East London has now become so keen and pressing that I do trust you will allow me to plead for help for the literally starving families by whom we are surrounded. Our visitors report case after case of homes in which is no fire, and children crying for bread."

The Success of the Central Union Mission in Washington, D. C., and the work it has done in the rescue of the victims of dissipation and vice, have suggested the idea of a national organization. The result is the organization of the National Gospel Mission Union. Three objects are contemplated: First, to send out evangelists; second, to organize Gospel missions on the plan of the Central Union Mission; and third, to establish a training school for mission workers.

The Home Established in Oberlin, O., for the children of foreign missionaries is endeavoring to obtain enlarged accommodations. Judson Cottage, the temporary home, is filled to overflowing. A permanent home building is needed at once to meet the applications of missionaries who wish to send their children to this country during this season and to give them the opportunities of the Oberlin schools. Four thousand dollars have already been raised for the enterprise, and other sums are promised

A Journey to Joppa.

Marion Harland's Journey Through Samson's Country—Nearing Lydda—Amid Groves of Orange and Olive—The House of Simon the Tanner—The Ancient Land of the Danites.

BOTH the carriage-road and railway from Jerusalem to Jaffa run through Samson's country, the stamping-ground of the long-maned, strongbacked, soft-hearted Nazarite. A village of new, neat farm-houses, one of Rothschild's colonies, is in the immediate vicinity of Zorah, the home of "a certain man of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah," and the birthplace of his son. A large rock, lately uncovered, is supposed from indications that it was used as an altar, to be that upon which the Danite offered the kid to the Lord:

"And it came to pass that when the flame went up toward heaven from off the altar that the angel of the Lord ascended in the flame of the altar, and Manoah and his wife looked on."

Samson's range in his fighting with the Philistines, and his courtings of divers women, lay between the hills on either side of the road. Zorah, Ekron, Gath, Kirjathjearim, Gaza, the rock Etam, Lehi—are names that suggest the years upon years of warring with the original lords of the land who were a chronic pest to the conquerors. The House of Dagon at Ashdod has left no trace upon the landscape of to-day; Ashdod itself is represented by a few poor mud-huts roofed with straw and turf.

Gezer, made a City of Refuge by Joshua and afterward taken by Pharoah of Egypt, rebuilt and given by him to his daughter, one of Solomon's wives — crowns a hill on the right of the road. Far up the heights on the left is the cave of Makkeddah (also lately discovered) in which Joshua cooped the five kings until the battle was won, when "he smote them and slew them, and hanged them on five trees, afterwards casting their bodies into the cave and laying great stones upon the cave's mouth, "which remain until this very day."

From the brook (marginal reading "valley") now a wide, dry waterbed, paved with loose white pebbles, crossed more than once by our track, David took the five smooth stones for his sling, and somewhere in this same valley was the great fight between Saul and the Philistines, who "stood on a mountain on one side, while Israel stood on a mountain on the other side, and there was a valley between them." It is impossible to designate the exact spot where the stripling confronted Goliath of Gath, but we select a locality to please ourselves, and fight the battle over to our satisfaction.

"Lydda was nigh unto Joppa," when Peter, tarrying in the smaller town with resident saints, healed Eneas, who had been bed-ridden for eight years—in the sublimely simple formula:

"Eneas! Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. Arise and make thy bed!"

He was still a sojourner in Lydda when summoned to Joppa by the news of Dorcas's death. The village is brought so near to the sea-port by rail that a touch of New World enterprise would make it a suburb easily accessible for merchants who care for purer air than is to be had in the narrow streets of modern Jaffa. The Crusaders set their stamp upon Lydda in the form of a noble church built above the alleged burial-place of St. George, the patron saint of England, and coupled in everybody's mind with the dragon. The remains of this structure, dating from the twelfth century, are amiably shared by the Greek Church and the Moslems, part of them being used as a mosque. Beside this building there is nothing of interest in the square village.

The approach to Jaffa is heralded by groves of orange and olive-trees. Bleak hills, where the only signs of human habitation are villages of low stone houses, the materials being taken, in many cases, from the ruins of citadels and walled towns, make way for sand-dunes drifted from the seashore by winds that make the harbor of Jaffa a word of terror over the world. Fertile patches fight with these — sometimes victoriously, sometimes with such indifferent success that the thin fringes of grass and starved-looking grain edge oases of vine and fig-lands, and end abruptly in yellow sand. Then, the orange-groves thicken into orchards encircled by hedges of prickly-pear with big, fleshy leaves and ugly stalks as crooked as snakes and large as a man's arm, and we plunge suddenly into a labyrinth of alleys, lined with dirty stone houses, standing flush with the pavement—the usual and now the old story in Syrian towns. One of these conducts us to the Jerusalem Hotel, a rambling building of various ages, over the modest doorway of which we read, "Go through, go through the gates."

Gardens lie behind it, and by way of these we go to see the house of Simon the Tanner, where Peter lodged. While neither of us believes that the unpretending building, evidently not more than five hundred years old, and which may be less, is that once occupied by the apostle's landlord, it is quite possible that the site may be the same. Tanning has been the business of the locality for perhaps twenty centuries, and the always restless surf of Jaffa booms against the sea-wall bounding the court-yard. We pay to enter this, the fee being taken by a man in the garb of a Moslem priest, the care-taker of the shabby mosque of which Simon's house is an appanage. Another man, similarly attired, lowers a skin bucket into the old well in the yard and gives us to drink of the water. It is exceedingly brackish and salt, as might be expected. We pluck a few leaves from the fig-tree overhanging it and ascend the short staircase, built upon the outside of the house to the flat roof. It is surrounded, like the pretty nest on the house-top we visited in Jerusalem, with hollow tiles arranged horizontally in geometrical designs and set in cement, for the convenience of Moslem women who would peep at the world. A parapet of some sort was about the house-top chosen by Peter as an oratory, "a battlement for thy roof" being one of the laws of Moses. The fisherman-disciple certainly never fell into a trance upon these cemented stones, yet the scene spread out for him that noon-tide, before the miraculous vision locked his senses against external objects, was like, in general features, that upon which our eyes now fasten eagerly. The great and wide sea — the "utmost sea" seen by Moses's dying eyes, —the Mediterranean, blue, seductive, and treacherous of mood and meaning, rolled and thundered then against a jetty built by a Roman Emperor. The ruins of this now make dangerous the always difficult business of landing and embarkation. The hills, the distant line of mountains, the ineffable blue of the smiling heavens, were beautiful then as they are now. But the town had, in Peter's time, a wall and gates and a Roman garrison, and commodious inlets where had been moored Hiram's floats laden with Lebanon cedar for the Temple in building at Jerusalem.

"And Me-jarkon and Rakkon with the border before (over against), Jopho (Joppa)," were deeded to the Danites in Joshua's grants of Palestine lands. From Joppa, Jonah, sailed for the port of Tarshish, instead of to Nineveh. The territory and town still belonged at that date to the Phœnicians from whom the Hebrews had never been able to take them. Joppa had been a bone of contention among Turks, infidels and Jews, and enough blood has been shed in defense and conquest of this rough key to the Mediterranean to dye the blue waters crimson. In using the figure, we look toward the east at a group of sand-dunes, pale-yellow in the sunlight, that should be forever red. There Napoleon—the great Napoleon—had three thousand prisoners shot in platoons, to avoid the trouble and expense of transportation to Egypt.

On our way to the hotel we meet a funeral procession, turn aside to let it pass, and then follow the line of march through the very muddiest streets we have eve seen, even in Palestine. Not one person in the company of mourners has shoes, o even sandals on his feet; the men wea abiehs and turbans, the women, gowns o dark-blue cotton and 'white (by courtesy) izzars. They are not too much afflicted t hold these up, we perceive, when the puc dles reaching clear across the street are un usually deep. The bier is borne upon th shoulders of four men. Our guide make us notice that it is an unpainted open box, s shallow that the breast, shoulders, and pr file of the corpse are visible from the groun

"He was poor, and the friends canne afford a new coffin. This has been use many times already. Rich people have ne and handsome coffins, which are som times buried with them. You hear that the sing happy songs," continues the speake a Jaffa man, and an acquaintance of Davi "That means that he was a good man. H made a prilgrimage to Mecca but lately, s short a time ago that he has, the Moslem think, surely gone to the bosom of th Prophet. He has not had time for muc sin since. So nobody cries, and the hymn are glad."

Maybe so, to an ear cultivated into a preciation of Syrian melody. To us, t happy hymns are as dolorous as dirge and like all other Moslem mus tuneless, but for the rythmic be of time such as a drum-stick brin from a drum in the intervals march or quick-step. The char ing of Southern negroes in an bellum days, of long sentence all upon one, or, at best, two not was something akin to the na sing-song to which the moth crew splash through pools in t lanes, and the stiffer mire of t market-place, where not a m or woman turns out of his w to make room for them—up to t door of the mosque, where leave them.

Our solitary call in Jaffa was up Miss Arnott, the principal of o of the best schools in the H Land, now over thirty years successful operation. Since lea ing Beirut, we had not sat in room that reminded us of home forcibly as the parlor where were entertained by the gentlewo an and philanthropist, to wh is due the good accomplished this great light in a dark pla David Jamal has two daught here, one engaged in teachi where she was herself taug the other as a pupil. All the t tive assistants are graduates the school, and the gentle dign of the principal is reflected in deportment of her subordinates Dismissing David and sendi Alcides with him, I had a lo and, to me, deeply interesting t with Miss Arnott. She left ho and country in her youth to vote her whole life to the task lifting her fellow-women out the depths wherein they h lain for ages of despotic rule and speakable degradation. She has laid h of the only hope of her sex in Syria, toiled hopefully for the girls who are to the wives and mothers of the next gene tion. A FRIEND IN JESUS.

"WHAT a Friend we have in Jesus,"
Sweetest words by mortal penned.
What a paradise this world is
When we've Jesus for our Friend.

When the sky of life is darkest,
And when grief our hearts doth rend
Is there not some ray of gladness
When we've Jesus for our Friend.

Though the cross of life seem heavy,
Yet he bore it to the end.
Oh! bear it patiently, my brother,
For the Saviour is your Friend.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Constant Reader, Topeka, Kan. The index print in the Gospel Hymns is clear and easily read. The collection is specially desirable for use in church and gives complete satisfaction.

Well-wisher, Marengo co., Ala. In all business letters, should an unmarried lady sign her full name, "Sarah E. May," or, "S. E. May?" Should "Miss" precede a name in parenthesis?

It is always well to sign the given name and surname in full, as "Sarah E. May." "Miss" is unnecessary, and is not employed by those who lay claim to good taste, although it is the rule for married ladies to sign "Mrs."

D. P. Donnell, Newburyport, Mass. Who was the author of the expression: "The good die young?"

Plautus the ancient Roman dramatist is supposed to have originated the phrase. His language was: "He whom the God's love dies young," and this has been paraphrased and adapted by a score of poets and prose writers since.

Dorothy C., Maysville, Ky. Do you think there is any reasonable objection to church-members playing whist? It cannot be called altogether a game of chance.

You must decide for yourself whether the objection is reasonable. It consists in the associations of the cards and in the example. If a child or a young person sees a professing Christian using the cards, he is liable to conclude there is no harm in them and will not draw close distinctions as to the character of the games played with them.

H. B. S., Big Bend, Ky. The subject of the sin against the Holy Ghost is exciting much discussion in our neighborhood; will you give us your opinion of what it is?

The question has been repeatedly answered already in this column, but for the benefit of our correspondent and several others who have written on the subject, we again give our opinion. It is that in our Lord's time it consisted in ascribing to Satanic power the miracles worked by the power of the Holy Spirit. If it may be committed in our day—about which there is some doubt—it probably consists in ridiculing and despising the work of the Holy Spirit as it is seen in conversions.

S. S. Teacher, Ottumwa, Ia. 1. What became of the head of John the Baptist? 2. What was the origin of surnames? 3. How large were the baskets in which the fragments were gathered after feeding the five thousand? 4. What do the words mean which stand between the division of the 119th Psalm.

1. There is no record. It was probably buried. Herodias would naturally be satisfied with the proof it gave of his death. She would have no further use for it. 2. Some originated in trades, as Smith, Baker, Wright, &c. Some in paternity, as Johnson, the son of John. Others in locality or some personal characteristic. 3. Probably they were simply the wallets of the disciples, such as men carried slung over their shoulders when they went on a journey. 4. They are the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Each part and its several verses begin in the Hebrew with the letter standing at the head of the section.

Subscriber, Anita, Iowa. Were the Children of Israel justified in borrowing of the Egyptians silver, gold, and jewels? Were they ever returned?

The transaction was not regarded on either side as a loan. The Revised Version (Ex. 12: 35) correctly translates the words, "They asked of the Egyptians," &c. It was the custom at parting of friends, or on the leaving of a servant, to make a gift. The idea is much like the backsheesh in Oriental lands at this day. The Israelites had fully earned the gifts by long years of unrequited labor, and the Egyptians in the panic were heartily willing to give them anything if they would only go, and go quickly.

W. S., Chanute, Kans. Does a man who has been converted in his youth and has led a consistent Christian life have to undergo a second change in order to sanctification?

The change is continuous beginning at his conversion. The Holy Spirit given to him then will, if he yields to his influence, enlighten him and strengthen him and promote his growth in knowledge and power. It is like the growth of a child to manhood, a constant progress. There are times when greater progress is made than at others, but there is no such marked change as at conversion, which is a reversal of the principles of life. In sanctification it is a continuance and development of the divine life in the soul.

THE MILLENNIAL PRIEST.

The Relation of Melchisedic to the Rule of Christ in the Millennium.

BY REV. WILLIAM MAUDE.

THE grey dawn of patriarchal history reveals to us no more majestic and significant figure than that of Melchisedec "King of Salem" and "priest of the most high God," who met Abraham, returning from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, the king of Elam, and his three confederate kings, in "the Valley of Shaveh, which, we are told by Josephus, was only two furlongs from Jerusalem.

It is in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis that Melchisedec is historically presented to us. The incident and its record, although so brief, and standing in such singular isolation from the thread of the history which it interrupts, is not only in itself most striking and interesting, but also in its typical teaching profoundly instructive. How suddenly and altogether unexpectedly does Melchisedec here appear before us—a most kingly and majestic form, yet clad in priestly robes, and with the mystic emblems of eucharistic offering—bread and wine—in his hands. We see those priestly hands raised in blessing; we observe the great patriarch, Abraham—the father of the faithful and the Friend of God—bowing before the mysterious priest-king, and presenting to him the tithes of all his spoil; and then, as abruptly as it appeared, the vision passes away, and for nearly a thousand years the voice of inspiration utters not again the name of Mechisedec.

Then, however, in an ecstatic Psalm of a most distinctly Messianic character, and descriptive of our Lord's exaltation in the day of his power, we meet with it once more, in the solemn declaration: "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec. (Ps. 110: 4.) Again, something like a thousand years pass away, and then, once more, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews take up the subject of this mysterious personage, who, "Without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days, or end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually" (Heb. 7: 3); and on the two brief references to him, above given, which are all that the Scriptures contain, founds an argument to show the superiority of Christ's priesthood, as being "after the order of Melchisedec," to that of Aaron, or Levi, which it had superseded.

Who was Melchisedec? Much labor has been wasted in attempts to answer the question. Later Jewish tradition identified him with Shem; and it is certain that that patriarch was not only alive in the days of Abraham, but even continued to live till Jacob was fifty years old. (Compare Gen. 11: 11 with verses 12: 26; 21: 5; 25: 7–26.) According to others he belonged to the family of Ham, or of Japheth; and it has been said that this is necessarily implied by the language of the Apostle, when, drawing a parallel between Melchisedec and Christ, he says that our Lord belonged to "a tribe of which no man gave attendance at the altar." Some, again, have suggested that he was an incarnate angel, or other superhuman creature, who lived for a time among men. Others have held that he was an early manifestation of the Son of God; and a sect, called the Melchisedecians, asserted that he was "an incarnation of the Holy Ghost." But, in all these conjectures, the fact has been strangely overlooked that the reticence of Scripture on the point is typical and significant, for, could it be determined who Melchisedec really was, it could no longer be said that he was "without father, without mother, without genealogy;" which statement is to be understood, not as implying that he was not a natural descendant of Adam, but that he designedly appears and disappears in the sacred narrative without mention either of his parentage or death.

There can, however, be no question that, whoever Melchisedec may have been, he was an eminent type of Christ. This is placed beyond doubt, not only by the language of the 110th Psalm—the Messianic character of which has ever been recognized by Jews and Christians alike,—but especially by the argument of the Apostle, in the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the course of which there occurs the explicit declaration that he was—in the various respects mentioned—"made like unto the "Son of God."

GOD-GIVEN SIGHT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Feb. 24. Acts 9: 1-11; 17-31.

WHAT blindness must be in all its deprivation no one can conceive by any effort of the imagination. To be shut out from the sight of the glorious springtime, to see no tree or flower or mountain or stream; to never behold the faces of loved ones; to have all literature placed beyond reach; to be kept from seeing a picture or a statue; to hear others talk of wonderful scenes and of delightful spectacles, and not to see—all this and more is included in the one word, blind. And there is a mental blindness which is an awful privation. The contrast between the condition of the blind man and the one who can see is but little more marked than that between the college bred man, with cultivated literary tastes, familiar with the treasures of history, poetry, philosophy, and the ignorant boor who has grown up in ignorance of the alphabet. The one revels in a realm of glorious delight in which the other has never set foot. Spiritual blindness and spiritual sight are in contrast quite as startling. A whole world of ecstatic experience lies between the two. The man to whom Christ gives sight now, has an experience as wonderful as he whose eyes Christ opened nineteen centuries ago in Jerusalem. He sees himself for the first time as he really is. That is a surprising revelation. The weakness, the meanness, the corruption of his nature are positively hideous, when he sees them with newly opened eyes. The sight is humiliating, but it is better that he should know. If a ship is rotten and her compasses are wrong, the sooner the owner and the captain know of it the better. If an insidious disease is sapping away the vitals, the discovery of its presence is not pleasant, but it is useful if it comes before it is too late to check and cure it. So the discovery of the evil in the soul, if unwelcome is beneficial. Then the eyes are opened to the possibility of attainment. When Christ has opened the spiritual eyes, high planes are visible which were not seen before. New pleasures, new delights, new capacities are revealed which may be possessed and at each point attained other heights beyond can be seen. "Be ye holy" and "going on unto perfection," become watchwords of life and progress. Then the eyes are opened to strange things in life. This world is an awful puzzle, a bewildering enigma to the man spiritually blind. Much of it remains a mystery to the end, but when the eyes are opened, a plan is discernible, which is so evidently wise in the little that we can see, that we are sure it will prove to be wise all through when we come to see it in its fulness. And the eyes are opened to the spectacle of human beings. There is a recognition of brotherhood in those around. The eyes being opened, the man sees that the poor and afflicted are his brothers with fraternal claims upon him. More than all, the eyes are opened to the majesty and tenderness of Christ himself. He is no longer an historical character, but a personal friend, ever near and always kind. So much and ever more and more day by day is seen by him whose eyes Christ opens.

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN VERMONT.

One of the most exhaustive and interesting reports, of beneficence we have seen in a long time is that sent to the "Silver Cross," by the King's Daughters of Vermont. It shows that the Circles, many of which are composed of school-girls, are not only doing work in their own respective neighborhoods but are reaching out to lend a hand to charitable enterprises at a distance. On this page we give a portrait of Miss Ethel R. Brown, the State Secretary; of Mrs. E. J. Warner, the Secretary of the Order in Franklin County, and of Miss Florence E. Clarke, the Secretary in Windham County. The Order now has ninety-two Circles with a total of 1806 members, an increase over last year's numbers of twenty-eight Circles and five hundred and eight members. The circles are scattered over the whole State and probably few knew how many there were until the recent Convention brought them together. Each county secretary collected the records from the Circle secretaries and the whole skilfully combined by the State secretary make up a report well worth reading. A few expressions are very significant of the simple, unobtrusive, earnest spirit that pervades the Order. One secretary writes: "We did not know how much there was to be done for Christ until we joined the Order and really looked for opportunities to serve him. Another says "Our work has not been so extensive as that of some other circles as we are busy school-girls." But this young lady—Miss Florence M. Hemenway—reports visits paid by her circle to the sick, and regular readings to a blind lady, and ministrations to a girl sick with consumption, which are occupations that all school-girls do not follow in their leisure hours. Mabel Hunt reports packages of Christmas gifts for poor children and the purchase of a pulpit Bible for a church. Jessie M. Aldrich, who is secretary of a school circle also makes light of the work done, but she speaks of making things pleasant for girls at school for the first time, and cheering those who are homesick, which certainly is Christlike work, as the girls so comforted would testify. It appears that there is a pioneer missionary in the Indian Territory who is indebted to this circle for a new saddle for his horse. Another circle is busy sewing and furnishing bedding for a Home for Destitute Children, a Home for Old Ladies, and a Home for Friendless Women. Mrs. R. J. Irwin reports from a circle that is keeping two children at school through the winter and helping to furnish a King's Daughters' Room in in an old Ladies' Home. Florence L. Allen is Secretary of a circle which has earned two hundred dollars to clothe and educate two little children and give coal and provisions to poor people. Mabel Brownell reports from a circle that has been preparing rose-leaves in Japanese rose-jars for patients in the hospitals; arranging for boating parties of invalid and poor children from the tenements and supplying money to a city missionary for use in his work. These are specimens of work done In His Name by the King's daughters of Vermont, and surely the King himself must be pleased as he sees how like it is to the work he did himself in the days of his earthly life.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

The Epworth League of Indiana is honored by the election to Congress of Hon. James E. Watson, who has served two years as State President. He succeeds Hon. William S. Holman in the Fourth District.——The Central Traffic Association has made the same terms as the Southern Passenger Association for the National Convention at Chattanooga, namely one-fare rate for the round trip. Other associations will doubtless make the same rate before the arrangements are finally completed. ——The Epworth League House Flower Mission in Boston, Mass., distributed 89,689 bouquets among the poor last year. They came from sixty-eight different Chapters.——Superintendent Van Orsdel sends an encouraging report of the Epworth Piegan Indian Mission. The new church at Great Falls was opened on Dec. 22. It has been built mainly through the efforts of Rev. E. S. Dutcher, who has been teaching and preaching at that point among the Indians for nearly two years. He is a skilful carpenter as well as a preacher and he worked himself among the laborers. The Indians hauled the lumber for the building. ——The Central German Church of Minneapolis, Minn., was the scene of a great convention of German Chapters from St. Paul, Minneapolis and the district recently. The meeting continued all day, excellent papers being given, interspersed with varied and pleasing musical exercises. Rev. C. F. Blume of Minneapolis was elected President for the ensuing year. —— The organization of the Epworth Guards is meeting with variable success. So much depends on the officers and there is so much difficulty in finding suitable men for the work that in many places the Guards have disbanded after a few months, while in other places the institution makes progress.

AN ANCESTOR OF Y. P. S. C. E.

Another illustration of the statement that there is "nothing new under the sun" is furnished to the "Golden-Rule" by Rev. Otis Cary, of Kyoto, Japan. He has in his posesssion an old record book which shows that in 1741—one hundred and fifty-four years ago, a society existed in connection with a church at the place now called Brockton, Mass., which was to all intents and purposes a Christian Endeavor Society, although it did not bear that name. Mr. Cary gives the rules of the Society, from which we extract the following, retaining the quaint old spelling:

"This agrement was made June 17, 1741, between those who thrue the grace of god have ben awackened in the davs of our vuth to be consarned about the things that belonge to our evalasting peace and that wolde remember our Creater in the days of our vuthe.

"It shall be our endeaveare to spend the tow ourse frome seven to nine of every lords dav eveneing in prayer togathare by turnse the one to begine and the outhear to conclud the meting and betwene the tow prayers haveing a sarmon repeated whereto the singing of a psalm shall be anexed and ef aftear the stated exersise of the eveneing are ovear if theare be any residue of time we will aske one a nothare questions out of the catecism or some questions in divinyty or have such reliagus conversation as we shall best sarve for the edefication of the sosiety."

"That we will bare with one anothare infarmitys and not upbrad tharwith nor deulge any thing of what natur soever to that is done at our metings to the pregedic of it."

"We do oblige our sevels to come directly from the pelaces whare we do live to our metings and to returne directly as sone as the meting is done oure homes without going any othour places or into any othar company."

Perhaps if there had been as many newspapers and as many facilities for communication in 1741 as there were in 1880, we might this year have been celebrating the one hundred and fifty-fourth anniversary of Christian Endeavor, not the fourteenth.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Efforts are being made in Brooklyn to secure for that city the National Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union for 1897. A committee has already been organized to promote the enterprise.

A thoughtful and kindly enterprise which has only just been reported was executed on Christmas-day in the French capital. The Anglo-American Y. M. C. A., 160, Rue Montmartre, Paris, and a Christian Endeavor Society made joint arrangements for entertaining lonely young people. Twenty-one young ladies and gentlemen enjoyed a good dinner, and passed a pleasant afternoon at the rooms of the Y. M. C. A.; and over thirty attended the tea and evening meeting at the chapel.

Dr. Vedder of the "Examiner," the leading New York Baptist journal, reads his brother Baptist editor, Dr. Wilkins, of the "Baptist Union," a lesson in Christian charity. He writes: It would greatly please many readers of the "Baptist Union," and promote the progress of the educational work of the B. Y. P. U. A., if that paper would refrain from its frequent spiteful "digs" at President Clark and Christian Endeavor. President Clark also presents in the "Golden Rule," a good-humored protest against the attacks of the Secretary-Editor.

A movement in the direction of organizing the Baptist Young People's Union of the South has been initiated at the Florida State Convention which passed a resolution recommending that "a committee of five be appointed to consider the expediency of a state organization and to report to the next state convention, said committee to confer with similar state committees during the meeting of the Southern Baptist convention, with reference to the general organization of the Baptist Young People of the South."

The B. Y. P. U. of Delavan, Wis., recently celebrated its fourth anniversary of its existence as a young people's society. Winter Sports in China.

A Imperial Sleighing Party at Pekin—The Young Ruler's Lonely Recreation on the Ice.—His Marvelous Sleigh.

ROYALTY has its disadvantages, and among them must be reckoned the exclusiveness that is necessarily imposed upon the ruler of a realm, in many of those innocent pleasures and recreations which the meanest of his subjects may enjoy in each other's society. Some Western rulers, it is true, have so far imbibed the democratic spirit that they mingle freely with certain privileged classes among their subjects; but in Eastern Europe and Asia, royalty still hedges itself about with barriers that shut out all except a very few favorites. The greatest precautions are taken to protect it from contact with the people, partly through apprehensions of danger and partly through the inherited fear of social contamination.

When the young Emperor of China goes abroad, all the avenues of access to his palace in the "Forbidden City" are cleared, so that none may gaze at or approach the Son of Heaven," as he is called by his loyal people, who love those absurd, high-sounding titles, that have been applied to royalty in the East from time immemorial. This "Forbidden City" is trebly barred against intrusion, being situated inside the "Yellow City," which is also inside the "Tartar City," each of the three being surrounded by a high wall and a moat. No foreigners are ever permitted to come within the walls of the palace enclosure, which surround a space two thirds of a mile in length, and half a mile broad; nor is any native of China, other than a member of the imperial household, allowed to enter.

Just outside the palace walls is a beautiful lake, spanned at its narrowest part by a marble bridge of exquisite architectural design. From this bridge, which the young Emperor has closed to all save the royal household—a fine view is obtained of the stretch of water which, in summer, is covered with lotus plants, whose beautiful pink flowers cover the lake like a carpet, and exhale a fragrance that can be felt a long distance. In the winter season, the lake is a sheet of ice, and the palace inmates pass many an hour sleighing across its smooth surface. Lately, the Emperor had a new and very handsome sleigh sent from Austria, and he is not deterred by the cares of state, nor even by the excitement which prevails over the war with Japan, from enjoying the exhilarating recreation of an occasional ride. When he goes sleighing, however, he has practically the entire lake to himself, for with the exception of his personal attendants, no one is allowed to go on the smooth surface of the lake, nor even to appear on the banks, except by special permission.

Around the lake are several venerable buildings, some of which are said to be nearly a thousand years old. On a distant hill (shown in the illustration), is a large white dagoba, and nearby is an altar erected to the memory of the originator of silk manufactures and to the gods that are supposed to control the silk-worm. In a small building close at hand, are thousands of silk-worms, which the Empress comes to feed once a year, thus setting the seal of royal approval on an industry which has been one of the main pillars of China's commercial greatness.

Childhood in Central Asia.

The juvenile life of children born in Central Asia is extremely brief. There a maiden of eighteen is considered almost an old woman, while she is generally married at the age of nine or ten. Boys wear loose garments and queer cone-shaped caps, and, when six years old, attend school pretty regularly, the daily session lasting from sunrise until quite late in the afternoon, with a few short intermissions for rest and eating. Holidays are few and far between. As soon as the scholars reach the schoolhouse in the morning they slip off their shoes, which resemble slippers, and sit "tailor-fashion," on mats on the floor in a semi-circle around the teacher, who keeps a long rod constantly at hand, and uses it, too, whenever a lad is inclined to be lazy. The Koran is their principal study, for their prophet has said, "All that is right to know is contained in the Koran." They are, however, taught to write and a little arithmetic and geography.

A Missionary's House Furnishing.

I do not know of anything simpler and more delightful than housekeeping in Japan—if you live a la Japonaise, writes a missionary. I myself determined to try it, and having found a suitable spot to settle in, on the highest hill in Tokyo, I proceeded to engage a native servant, who was also to be my adviser as to how to furnish my establishment in strictly Japanese fashion. The furnishing was complete in less than ten minutes, and here are some of the principal items of which it consisted: two foutangs or thin mattresses, between which one lies at night, and a makura, a wooden pillow, or rather an intrument of torture for the first few nights, furnished my bedroom; a hibachi or brass brazier, with chopsticks to stir the fire with, and a water-kettle, made the hall cosy; and a little lacquer table, a foot square and about six inches high, with a couple of tiny little plates and a bowl, made the dining-room quite complete, and replete with every comfort. Two silk cushions were placed in the sitting-room for distinguished guests to sit on. "Ah," said I to my servant, "but do you not think that I shall need something more?"—as, to my European mind what I had purchased seemed somewhat insufficient to furnish a twelve-roomed house. "No, sir," said he, in his broken English; "real Japan gentleman has no furniture."

Domestic Education.

Let domestic education begin from the cradle. Let the little girl not as tall as the table wipe knives and spoons, which won't break, and dust off a few chairs, writes J. C. Fernald. On baking day, let her make actual biscuits in little patty-pans, and bake them in the real oven, and learn what is the matter and what to do in that awful situation when they stick to her fingers, and discover how the amount of dough which she knew was altogether too little, fills the pan brimful by the time it is risen and baked. When school-days begin, insist on time for domestic teaching. Have no studying at home, and no books brought home, except at the end of a term. Five hours a day of close study is enough for any human being under sixteen years of age. Some of the brightest and most successful students we ever knew were educated without ever taking a book home for study from the common schools. And such have carried the love and the power of study on into mature life, instead of being unutterably relieved at "finishing their educaiion," and hoping never to see their books again. If school work is limited to school hours, then light household tasks will benefit, and not injure health. Such exercise is infinitely better than sauntering up the street in full dress, and more restful than reading sensational romances. If but five or six hours a day of book-study are required, there will be time to learn household arts, and time, too, for good, hearty recreation, which will be entered on, then, with wonderful zest.

Mother's Letter.

Oh! you'll never forget it. It's dear old memory comes back to you now like the fragrance of flowers whipped and whiffed from far-off fields on every whirling wind.

What if it were an old piece of soiled paper? It was more to you than a thousand perfumed and gilt-edged notes from other lands. What if the lines were not followed with mathematical exactness. It was mother's letter and that fact makes the lines read straight. What if tear stains did soil its edges; they were tears that fell from mother's eyes, as she wrote to you, and that made them seem more beautiful than jewels that sparkle in the coronet of the queen.

Yes, mother's letter came to you just in the nick of time. You were in a boarding-house, heavy-hearted, sick, despondent, but mother's letter was to you a new breath of life, and came with the welcome of the mountain breeze, that invigorates as it fans every passing stranger. It was sweet as the perfume-laden air that came creeping through, bounding over the orchard pickets, in spring time, when the blossoms were out in all their beauty. Like the kiss she gave in childhood, her letters of later years have been an inspiration, and mother, though now you're silent in the churchyard yonder, your letters, like your loving life, live to bless us still.

AWAY FROM HOME.

STANDING forth on life's rough way,
Father guide them;
O! we know not what of harm
May betide them;
'Neath the shadow of thy wing,
Father, hide them;
Waking, sleeping, Lord, we pray
Go beside them.

When in prayer they cry to thee,
Thou wilt hear them;
From the stains of sin and shame
Thou wilt clear them;
'Mid the quicksands and the rocks
Thou wilt steer them:
In temptation, trial, grief,
Be thou near them.

Unto thee we give them up,
Lord, receive them;
In the world we know must be Much to grieve them;
Many striving oft and strong
To deceive them;
Trustful, in thy hands of love
We must leave them.

HOME INFLUENCE.

THE atmosphere of a home is the spirit of that home, as evidenced in the conduct and bearing of the parents, and of all whom the parents influence. The atmosphere itself—there, as in all the natural world—is not seen, but is felt. Its effects are clearly observable; but as a cause it is inferred rather than disclosed. Indeed, the better the atmosphere in a home, the more quietly pervasive its influence. Only as the home atmosphere is inimical to the best interests of those who feel its power, does that atmosphere make itself manifest as an atmosphere, rather than give proof of its existence in results that cannot otherwise be accounted for. You enter one home, and, mingling with the family there, you feel the balmy air of love and sympathy. Parents and children seem to live for one another, and to be in complete accord in all their enjoyments and occupations; and all is restful in the peace that abides there. You are sure that everything in the moral and social atmosphere of that home tends to the fostering and growth of whatever is best in the child-nature. It is obvious that it is easier for a child to be good, and to do well, in such a home as that, than in many another home. You enter another home, and the chill of the household air strikes you unpleasantly, at the first greeting given to you by any member of the family. There is a side of the child-nature that you know needs more warmth than that for its developing. Again it is the burning heat of an excited and ever-driving household life that you are confident is withering the more delicate and sensitive tendrils of the young hearts being trained there. Yet again, it is the explosive storm-bursts of passion which tear through the air, that make a home a place of peril to the young for the time being, however it may seem in the lulls between tempests. In the one case as in the others, it is the home atmosphere that settles the question of the final tendency of the home training.

A Child's Faith.

The first lesson in the training of a child's faith is the lesson that he is to have faith in God, writes Rev. H. C. Trumbull. Many a child is told to have faith in the power of prayer, or faith in the value of good conduct, without being shown that his faith should rest wholly and absolutely on God. He is told that he can hope to have whatever he prays for; and that if he is a good boy he can expect a blessing, while if he is a bad boy he cannot expect to be blessed. With this training the child's faith is drawn away from God, and is led to rest on personal conduct; whereas it ought to be trained to rest on God to whom he prays.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Suiting discipline to the character of children.

THE Gordon family now consisted of father, mother and three children, Mabel, Wallace and Roy; Mabel now seven years of age was a beautiful, lovely child. Since Annie's conversation with her husband about her angelic temperament. Mabel had shown enough of human nature to remove her mother's fears on the wing question. She was still a child of uncommon qualities, one who never required reprimand, one whose mother's wishes were her pleasure, and as the eldest she developed rapidly and became very soon the companion for her parents. By nature she was unselfish, always ready to yield to the younger children, and in this respect she resembled both father and mother.

Wallace, the second child was three years of age and was very different in many respects. His will was a great obstacle in his governmont, for it oftentimes amounted to wilful stubbornness. Many were the contests which Annie had with this child, and though she always came off victorious, still she had to encounter the same spirit each time and the next.

One day after a long struggle, she said to her husband: "At last I have found the key to Wallie's heart."

"Ah! What is it?"

"I had a siege with him this morning. He had snatched Mabel's round comb from her hair,and was bending it back and forth at the danger of snapping it, when, without any thought of any contest, I said: 'Wallie, don't do that, my boy, you will break sister's comb. Give it back to her.'

"He looked at me a moment and started to bend it again, but when he saw that I looked firm, he threw the comb with force across the room toward Mabel. She stooped to pick it up, but I said: 'Stop, Mabel, mamma told Wallie to give the comb to you, not to throw it, he must mind me, must do exactly as I said.'

"Then very gently I said to Wallie, 'Go, pick it up, my little boy, and hand it to sister.'

"He turned around, his black eyes flashing defiance. I saw it, but did not appear to read their language, but said quietly: 'Are you not going to be mamma's good little boy?'

"Very deliberately, but very firmly, he bowed his little head and said: 'No'm.'

"I spoke more sternly. 'Wallie, you must do just as I tell you, I shall be sorry to punish you, but you must pick up the comb then, and hand it to your sister. Is not my little boy going to mind mamma?'

"Again came out the doleful, 'No'm.'

"'Wallie,' I said, 'I shall have to whip you if you do not mind me, and mama does hate so much to hurt her little boy,'

"As he made no motion toward it, I called nurse Nancy and told her to bring me a switch, for I would have to punish Wallie. She began begging for him: 'Miss Annie, indeed dat chile too little to understand you. Nancy 'll pick it up for you, honey.'

"But I stopped her and said: 'No, Nancy, Wallie must pick it up himself, and I shall certainly punish him if he does not mind me.'

"How bravely I talked, and what a poor relenting heart I carried in my bosom! How I wished I had never made an issue of so trifling a circumstance! How I resolved for the future, but the future was far off and the present was right before me. Then for fear he did not understand me I said: 'Wallie, see here. Mamma wants you to pick up this comb—so—and then hand it to sister—so. Do you understand me?'

"He nodded out, 'Yes'm.'

"Then I said: 'Very well, go now and pick it up and do as I have told you.' But he only looked at it and sobbed.

"'Are you not going, Wallie?' 'No'm.'

"Then I whipped him, but he sobbed out 'No'm' again. Then my heart grew faint. Mabel and Nancy were both crying, and the little fellow was sobbing hard. For a moment I lifted my heart in prayer to God for strength, then outwardly calm, I called him to me, and I whipped him again. He was still so firm, that I felt almost heartbroken, and I bent over him, and in the very depths of despair and distress said: 'Oh! my little boy doesn't love his mamma, doesn't love her one bit.'

He spoke quickly — 'Yes, me do love my mamma, me do love you.' Then he wound his little firm arms around my neck and kissed me, I never was so glad of a kiss in my life. My heart gave a big bound, for it seemed to me that I saw my way out of the tangle. I schooled my voice not to appear too glad and spoke as before: 'No, you don't, you can't love your mamma when you treat her so, you don't mind me, you can't love me.'

"'Me do love you,' still caressing me.

"'If you do love me,' I said, 'you would go right straight and pick up the comb and give it to sister.'

"I felt his arms loose their hold of me, in another minute he had picked it up, in another it was in Mabel's glad hand, and in another he had climbed upon my lap. I pressed him tight to my heart as I thanked God for this new victory. It seemed to me as I held him there that I was the very happiest women in existence. Yes, I have found out the key to Wallie's heart. It is love, and I will use it after this."

"What would you have done," Dr. Gordon asked,"if Wallie had remained obstinate?"

"I do not know," said Annie, "I was dreadfully anxious."

"Yes, I can imagine that. I think you may congratulate yourself on the result. If Wallie had held out you would have been hopelessly discredited. I think it is a bad plan to make an issue of that kind. I would not do it again. As he gets older his will may not be so easily overcome. It is quite sufficient to say to him, 'You must pick that comb up and give it nicely to your sister otherwise I shall have to whip you.' That gives him the choice and you avoid the struggle in which you cannot afford to be beaten."

"Yes, I see that now. I am very glad this struggle ended well."

"Annie, my dear wife, I am sorry, yet glad, on account of this struggle. Love is the best key to unlock anybody's heart,and it is a key that can never be counterfeited. Mothers often talk about difference in disposition and blood. Well, I always did believe in blood. I think good blood is just as necessary in people as it is in horses. Look how a horse's blood is boasted of, and how his genealogy is traced back, and it certainly more important for human blood to be good than for horse blood. In my practice, I often hear the complaint, 'This child is just bad, he cries all the time,' when upon examination the child is sick. In my opinion the fault of bad children lies more with the mother than with the children. If they all had as good mothers as my children, why——"

"Oh, you flatterer. I do not quite agree with you, though once I did. Mabel and Wallie have convinced me that oftentimes the difference lies, in great measure, in the children, for see how dissimilar ours are. I think, however, that a good mother can control this difference. Mabel, by nature, is sweet and yielding. Wallie loves his way, and if you put yourself in opposition to him, you raise all of the salient points of his character, and their name is legion. As for baby Roy, I tremble for him and for myself, too, when he grows large."

"He is a smart little chap, but strange, I confess."

"He is not like any other child I ever saw. He never slept like other babies, fights sleep until it overpowers him, and then he yields because he cannot help himself, and at the first peep of day he is up. You caution me about overtaxing his brain. I try to be careful in this respect, but he is going all day long, is never still, and his big head is full of baby thoughts, and he won't be quiet, he won't be still a minute."

A call for Dr. Gordon interrupted the rehearsal of baby peculiarities, or they might have proceeded ad infinitum. As time advanced, the indomitable will so plainly discernable even in Roy's babyhood, now acknowledged no authority but his own; his will was supreme, and it was to him an inexplicable thing that anyone for a moment could have the audacity to doubt the sovereignty of that will. He was a tyrant, a despot, a military dictator, and Annie looked forward to each day with dread; but when it was over, she rejoiced that he was one day farther removed from the realms of infancy, and one nearer that of reason. She had practiced diversion, but now she felt its day was over, yet every effort of hers to control him exasperated him beyond endurance. She knew the time must come when he would have to find out that there was higher authority than his, a will even surpassing his own.

The encounter came, we will not rehearse the scene, but it was a two hours' struggle alone in her room, and when the young mother came out, bringing her boy in her arms, both had been purified through suffering. If it was a two hours' conflict, it was also a two hours' prayer, and hence the victory.

Telling Mrs. Somers her trouble with Roy, the good woman remarked:

"He is an uncommonly bright child, and if trained aright, will be a power for good. That very will, if rightly directed, will prove of inestimable value."

"But the responsibility, Mrs. Somers, the training aright! the rightly directing, all devolves on me."

"When we are weak you know, dear, then we are strongest."

"Yes, I believe this. Oh! I do feel childishly weak sometimes — feel, sometimes, that I must sink under the terrible responsibility. Dr. Gordon aids me all he can, but he is at home so little, I don't want the little time he is there to be taken up with scolding and punishing. Besides, a mother being with her child so much, soon learns his natural propensities, I can and must operate upon these. Let me give you an instance to show how I have to manage Roy. One Sabbath afternoon late, he was down on the lower terrace telling Bible stories, in his original way, to some little girls who were staying a week with Mabel. I wanted to wash his face and put a clean apron on before papa came, so I sent for him. He didn't choose to come, so he went on talking. After I had sent three times, I saw his head rise slowly above the terrace, and not liking my serious face, he concluded to postpone the interview as long as possible, so he walked around every tree and every bush on each terrace. I did not wait, but went to my room determined to be patient. Presently he came running in with a bright smile, calling out: 'Mamma, oh! mamma, did you want me?'

"'Yes!' I said, 'I sent for you.'

"'Well, what did you want with me, mamma?'

"I walked to my escritoire, took out some nuts and candy I had some time before put away for him, and holding them out in my hand, said: 'I had some nice nuts and candy for a good little boy who minded his mamma, but I haven't found him yet, so I will put these back, till he does come.'

"I put them back in the desk, locked it, and dropped the key into my pocket. His face was blank, but he said nothing. Mabel, who was standing by, said: 'Mamma, Roy was not very good in the yard, he called May a rascal.'

"'Why, Roy,' I began, but in an excited way he started—'Why, sissie, I didn—I nev—Eh—I didn'—then with the brightest face and most excited manner, he turned to me, 'Oh! mamma, mamma, if you had a little boy and your little boy had a little hatchet, and your little boy was to cut down your little cherry tree and you was ter say, did you cut down my cherry tree? And he was ter say, Yes'm, 'cause I can't tell a lie—You wouldn't whip him, would you, mamma? No, you wouldn't, 'cause your little boy didn't tell a lie.'

"I turned my back to keep him from seeing my smile; and, controlling my voice, I said indifferently: 'No, I don't know that I should;' then looking at him seriously, I asked: 'Roy, did you call May a rascal?'

"'Yes'm—but you ain't going to whip me though, is you, 'cause I told the truff?'"

"That was certainly amusing," sai Mrs. Somers, "for a three-year-old boy. think you acted wisely. He remembere the Washington legend pretty well; is h truthful?"

"Very, Mrs. Somers, and I look upo this as his salvation."

"You are right. Use that good quality Annie; play upon that one string, it wi make sweet music after awhile. It will brin other strings to harmony."

"I think I am, Mrs. Somers, but som times it is very hard to decide on the wise course. The other day he was going t play in the hall and I said, 'Roy, don't g in the parlor to play.'

"'No, ma'am,' he said, as he closed th door, but he opened it again, put his hea in and said, 'I won't promise, mamma, f you know I might forget.'

"Of course, I did not insist upon th promise, but he did not forget. He is ver independent; has been from a baby, th most independent child I ever saw.

"He is certainly original. The other da he came in with Nancy, and knowing th he had not been well, I asked him how h was, when he replied very seriously: 'I fe weller than I did to-morrow.'

"Yes, he is all the time making que speeches and sometimes they startle u Your speaking of his truthfulness and ca tioning me to use it reminds me of a litt incident that occurred last month. Mab had given him her small dumb-bells an had larger ones made for her calisthen exercises. The smaller children were strive for a prize, and Roy's little dum bells just fitted Lily Jones' tiny hands, an he was very devoted to Lily. She aske me if I would lend them to her to use practising, and on the prize night, and consented at once, glad to oblige her, an sent them over. A few days after, whi playing at her house, he spied his dum bells, seized them, walked straight hom and standing before me with flashing eye said: 'Mamma, you had no business lend my dumb-bells to Lily.'

"It was by no means a pretty speec but I know that there is much wickedne in his little heart I would rather it wou open right before me so I can guide hi aright, hence I let the words pass and me ly said: 'No, Roy, I ought not to let Li have your dumb-bells without speaking you, for they belong to you and not to m but I did not believe my little boy wou care. I knew that you loved dear little Li so much, and I felt sure you would be gl to lend them to her. You have broug them home, now don't you want to be sweet, pretty boy and carry them back?'

"'I'd like to be sweet very well, but don't care nothin' 'bout the pretty. I' not going to carry em back. I'm going hide em where nobody can't find em.'

"I did not remonstrate, believing it t part of wisdom to forbear, but I was trouble since Lily was depending on m promise, and the night was drawing nea I waited and thought before acting. No he always goes with me to the dining-roo and sits up in the high chair at the tab while I put the finishing touches to the t ble, and then he rings the bell. When w were alone at the breakfast table ne morning, I said, 'Roy, you wouldn't ma mamma tell a story would you?'

"'You, mamma? Why no'm.'

"'Well, don't you see I promised lend Lily your dumb bells, and if I don't it, won't that be a story?'

Thinking seriously a minute he burst o with a merry laugh and said, 'But you c lent em to her.'

"Oh!' I replied, 'but I promised her s should practice with them, and then u them on the night of the 'show,' as y call it.'

His face grew serious, and he was qu all through breakfast. After he had finis ed, he hurried off and carried the dum bells back to Lily. He let her practi with them, then went with me on the pri night to the exhibition, saw her use them the Calisthenic drill, made no complaint comment. Next morning, almost as so as he was dressed, he went over, took po session of his property and brought the home."

"He is a strange child, certainly, b Annie, he will, I am persuaded, be a co fort to you yet. Keep him close to you, e courage him to talk out all his heart, mak him your companion, and with God's bles ing, Roy will make a noble man for h possesses those qualities which will mak him a power for good.

WE begin, with Nahum and his "burden of Nineveh." This servant of God recorded his dark visions of the doom awaiting that city, according to Knobel, whom rationalistic critics admire and ...st, sometime between 1713 and 1711 B.C. ...anon Driver however suggests a later ...te. That is, if we follow Knobel, upward ...a hundred years elapse between the writ...g and the tragedy; if we follow Driver, ...en more than fifty years divide them. ...ut these conquerors were also to array ...emselves against God's people, and Isaiah ...oclaimed the inevitable calamity (chap. ...), long before the Babylonian power re...rded itself as strong enough to cope with ...ineveh. Micah is equally explicit on this ...eme. He relates how the Hebrews should ... led into their second bondage, and, according to some authorities, fully two hun...ed years before the accomplishment of ...eir deliverance, described their return to ...erusalem. The passages which chronicle ...ese momentous movements are admitted ... be genuine, and their fulfilment is a mat... of history.

Tyre likewise was a subject of prophecy. ...aiah (chap. 23), a long while before the ...ighty agent in working out the desola...ons recorded had acquired national prom...ence or importance, gave a detailed ac...unt of what should occur. Gesenius in ...s "Commentary," thus explains the lan...age of a part of the prediction: Behold, this ...ople of the Chaldeans, a little while ago ...habitants of the desert, to whom the As...rians first assigned settled habitations ...d made it a people: this hitherto insig...ficant people, scarcely deserving mention, ...all be the instrument of the destruction of ...e ancient world-wide famous city of Tyre. ... It is historically certain that Tyre was ...esieged by the Chaldeans and commercial... ruined, and that new Tyre, situated on ...e island and subsequently devastated by ... lexander, submitted to the conqueror. ...eremiah and Ezekiel (Jer. 1; Ezek. 26: 4, 5) ...ace her vicissitudes to her final doom, and ...he latter in the name of the Lord writes: ... will also scrape her dust from her, and ...ake her like the top of a rock. It shall be ... place for the spreading of nets in the ...idst of the sea. Concerning the fulfil...ment of such a minute statement, Volney gives this testimony: The whole village of Tyre contains only fifty or sixty poor families, who live obscurely on the produce of their little ground and a trifling fishery. The barbarisms of the Greeks of the lower empire have accomplished their predictions. Instead of that ancient commerce so active and extensive, Tyre, reduced to a miserable village, has no other trade than the exportation of a few sacks of corn and raw cotton; nor any merchant but a single Greek factor, who scarcely makes sufficient profit to maintain his family.

EVERY MOTHER SHOULD Have it in the House

A Valuable Book.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact recognized by physicians, that a very large majority of the diseases of mankind begin with irritation and inflammation in that part of the body which becomes affected by the disease. Inflammation is an unhealthy condition of the tissues, manifested externally by heat, redness and swelling, internally by congestion of the blood vessels, causing pain, disease and growth of unsound tissue. It is very important that every person should understand the nature and home treatment of inflammations. For this purpose, I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston, Mass., have had compiled from the highest medical authorities for family use, an illustrated book, entitled "TREATMENT FOR DISEASES." The book contains a description of all ailments caused by or accompanied with inflammation, alphabetically arranged; also the treatment for such. The book is printed in plain, simple language that all can understand. It is a valuable and complete treatise which everyone should have for ready reference. The publishers will send one copy in paper covers, to any person on receipt of their name, address and a two cent stamp for postage. I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston

The Late Dr. A. J. Gordon.

Death of the Eminent Preacher and Writer—His Life of Service in the Cause of Christ—Some of his Books.

CHRISTIAN people on both sides of the Atlantic are mourning the loss of one to whom they have for many years looked as a leader, a teacher and a friend. Few there are in any denomination who are not familiar with the name of Dr. A. J.

THE LATE DR. A. J. GORDON.

Gordon, the famous Boston preacher, whose earnest, manly utterances from the pulpit and the press have been blessed of God to the conversion of many souls. To the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD especially his name was dear; for in these pages he often gave expression to thoughts which he desired to reach a wider circle than that to which his voice could penetrate. Not many days before his death he sent us two sermons for publication, and these will form his last message to our readers. Little did he then think that they would be his last words to the vast audience to which he counted it a privilege to minister. But had he known, they could not have been more earnest, or more intense. Dr. Gordon put himself and all that was best in him into every sermon he preached, making no effort to amuse or please his hearers, but preaching the truth with a profound conviction that he was delivering a message from God. To Christians, as well as to outsiders, he had a message and with both he pleaded eloquently and earnestly in his Masterts cause. None could listen to him or read his thrilling words without being impressed by his love for souls and his profound conviction that in Jesus alone could true happiness be found for this life and that which is to come. He was continually urging the sinner to put his trust in Christ, and then to follow Him in love and service, growing into closer likeness to Him day by day. It was a great work that he did, glorious in its results to the church of Christ. To him surely would the greeting be given, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

He was born at New Hampton, N. H., on April 19, 1836. His father was for many years an enthusiastic supporter of foreign missionary work, and an ardent admirer of the pioneer American missionary, Adoniram Judson, "the apostle of Burmah." To him he tendered a tribute of homage by naming his son after him. He was converted to Christ at the age of sixteen, and united with the church at New Hampton. Almost immediately afterwards he was strongly influenced to become a preacher of the Gospel. He entered a preparatory school with the distinct object of fitting himself for a theological training in college. Thence he went to Brown University, where he entered with zest, even while a student, into active Christian work, teaching in the Sabbath School and helping in missions in the neighborhood around.

In 1860, at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Gordon graduated. He then proceeded to Newton Theological Seminary, for a more special course of training for ministerial and pastoral work. Before the completion of his studies there, he had already entered upon his life's labor, by accepting, at the earnest solicitation of the people of Jamaica Plain, Mass., the office of pastor of the Baptist church in that place. His ordination took place in June, 1863, and until the year 1869, Dr. Jordan continued there. He then received a call from Boston to become the minister of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church in that city. He accepted the call, and went to his new sphere with the expectation of doing vigorous and energetic work. He was not disappointed in that expectation, nor in the anticipated results. A new edifice was erected, which was soon filled with worshippers.

Dr. Gordon was a student of prophecy and a believer in the Premillennial Advent. In the fall of 1878 he took a prominent part in the Prophetic Conference held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York. There are few who were present at that conference who will ever forget the fervent address he delivered there on "The First Resurrection," or the rapt attention in which he held the vast audience which hung breathless on his lips.

As an author Dr. Gordon has become known to English-speaking Christians the world over. In 1872 he issued the volume entitled "In Christ," in which he dealt with one of the deepest and tenderest themes of the Gospel—the believer's union with his Lord. Dr. Gordon intended the book to be an aid to meditation, and very excellently it fulfills that purpose, being devout as well as suggestive.

A volume of twenty sermons appeared in 1880 under the title "Grace and Glory." They cover a wide range of Christian life and thought, and are, withal, so simple that the child in Christ may understand and feed upon them. Among the most characteristic and impressive of these sermons is that on "The Virgins' Lamps," in which Dr. Gordon gives a very lucid and impressive exposition of his belief in the Premillennial Coming of the Lord. "Congregational Worship," and "The Ministry of Healing," followed in quick succession. In 1886, Dr. Gordon published "The Twofold Life; or, Christ's Work for us and Christ's Work in us." His latest work published last December is "The Ministry of the Spirit."

MEMORIES OF OLIVET.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

HOW precious are thy memories,
Oh, sacred Mount of Olivet,
Where Jesus often bent his knees.
Upon thy soil with night-dews wet;
When vexed and wearied with the rude
And vulgar throng, then it was there,
He sought its peaceful solitude,
To find sweet rest in hallowed prayer.

In view of yonder gath'ring throng,
Upon its sloping sides he taught
His dear disciples, while they hung
On every word, with wisdom fraught.
From scenes enacted near its base,
I ween the stars refused their light,—
Or moon 'neath clouds, concealed her face.
On our dear Lord's betrayal night.

To his disciples oft he spoke.
Within the olives' cool retreat.
How Jewish hatred would provoke,
The cruel death he was to meet.
The soil of Olivet was pressed,
By his dear feet so lately riv'n
As lifting up his hands, he blessed
Them one by one, then rose to heav'n.

Yet one more promise sure and blest,
Is lying in the future yet;
Some day his feet again shall rest,
Upon the Mount of Olivet.

Taking

it for granted that you want to get the best results in painting, you will have to use Pure White Lead to obtain them. There are many mixtures branded "White Lead," "Pure White Lead," etc., which contain little, if any, White Lead, but are principally barytes, which is of little value, if not worthless. To be sure, accept only a genuine brand (see list).

If you want any shade of color, tint the White Lead with National Lead Co.'s tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. A feature of these colors is the ease with which they are used and the exactness with which the desired shade is obtained. For particulars send for pamphlet, free.

THE ORIGIN OF THE JUGGERNAUTH.

According to Hindoo legend, the origin of Juggernauth was as follows: A timber-god, which was the unburnt body of Krishna, had been kept hidden in the Neilgherries hills and worshipped by a low-caste man — a huntsman. A prince of Malva tried to bring out the timber-god from the hill for public worship. A Brahmin succeeded in tracing the whereabouts of the god by the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Basu Sahar, whose guest the Brahmin was. He married the girl, and was permitted to go blind-folded with her to see the god. But to be led blind-folded was what the Brahmin did not desire; he wanted to know the path. His wife gave him some teel-seed, telling him to strew the seeds on both sides of the road. In time the plants grew and revealed the secret path to the place of the god. But they were sadly disappointed at not finding the timber-god. They were told to build a temple and then to take the god, whom the king would find flooting in the sea. Even by the employment of elephants, he could not drag the timber-god ashore. The prince was helped by the gods, and easily carried away the piece of timber, and then employed twelve hundred men to make a god out of it; but they could not even make a scratch on the wood.

At last the god Bishun himself, assumed the form of an old carpenter and obtained permission to construct the image within twenty-one days, on condition of being shut up in the temple for those days without interruption. On the fifteenth day the Raja opened the door and saw, to his great amazement, the form of Juggernauth without hands and feet. The king and queen prostrated themselves before the god, who gave instructions to them about his worship.

THE MOTHER'S CHAIR.

THE century's day had just begun
When the bride, as shy as a small grey mouse
Came home one eve at the set of sun,
And reign a queen in a wee bit house,
A wee bit house but love was there,
And in its throne was the bride's small rocking-chair.

Time fared along, and the rocking-chair
Kept peace with the rise and fall of a tune
That the little mother caroled there,
Slowly and sweetly, rune and croon,
Mother and baby and rockaby,
As the busy and beautiful years flew by.

And the wee bit house was a crowded nest
That was left one day for a statelier home,
But the small chair stood in its place with the best.
A throne for the mother, whoe'er might come.
Babies and babies were cradled there
In her tender arms, in that rocking-chair

The years spread on like the waves in a race,
And small grandchildren fluttered in;
The dear old hearth was the rallying place
For a bevy of youthful kith and kin
Always, the centre, standing there
Was the dear little mother's rocking-chair.

Love sifted snowflake the days trooped on,
All the mother heard the angels call;
One sunrise broke with the mother gone—
Only to heaven—that was all.
But, O, it was lonely lingering where
She knelt to her in her little chair!

And one of the youngsters of all the line,
A gay girl, just out of college, sits
In that same old chair, and in shade and shine
Look of her great grandmother flits
O'er her face, so sweet and fair,
As she rests in the prim little rocking-chair.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Ten Thousand Mouths Instead of One.

That is just what Electropoise gives us when we need it. The moment we become sick our one mouth becomes inadequate. An abnormal demand for oxygen of the air has been created. We have a fever, we are burning faster than we ought. Our breathing apparatus, mouth, nose and lungs, worked to their best fails us, and we suffer. Treatment with Electropoise multiplies our breathing powers by polarizing the body. It opens the pores and this enables us literally to breath at every pore.

We will be glad to mail you a descriptive book giving theory, results, and price of Electropoise treatment. It is not a battery, no shock, no necessity for recharging or any extra expense.

Electropoise
TRADE MARK.

The wife of Justice Howell E. Jackson, of the United States Supreme Court, says:

1311 K ST., N. W.
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 5, 1894.

Ever since I began to use the Electropoise in our family, I have taken frequent occasion to speak to my friends of its wonderful curative powers. We have both the pocket and wall Electropoise, and we would not part with either under any circumstances.

I have found that no medicine or drugs will so quickly give relief as the Electropoise, and particularly is this true of a cough, or in case of sleeplessness. The application of the instrument almost instantly stops the cough, and thereafter produces sleep. Ordinarily, I decline to give public testimonials, for I very much dislike notoriety in any form, but I take pleasure in recommending the Electropoise, because of the wonderful relief it has accomplished in our family.

Yours truly, MRS. HOWELL E. JACKSON.

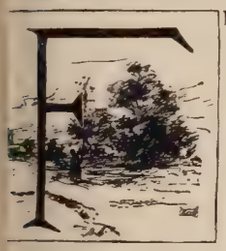
Training Poor Syrian Girls.

Mrs. Jamal's Noble Efforts in Behalf of her Neglected Countrywomen in Jerusalem —A Work that has Brightened Many Young Lives, Brought Happiness to Humble Homes and Led Hearts to Christ—Described by its Founder.



FEW subjects associated with the every day life of the people of modern Palestine have awakened more interest in the minds of American women than the effort now being made by Mrs David Jamal, to train, educate and spiritually enlighten the poor neglected Syrian girls of Jerusalem. From time to time, the progress of this laudable and beautiful work has been reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and a number of our readers, who have become specially interested in Mrs. Jamal's classes, have undertaken to share the burden of their support for a time.

The lady who founded this work is a woman of fine Christian character, and the wife of a leading dragoman. She was educated in a Christian school for girls at Beirut, and afterward went to Jerusalem as a native helper in a school in in that city. Since her marriage, she has devoted a large part of her time and all her available means to the training and education of young Syrian girls, too many of whom, in Palestine at least, are allowed to reach womanhood in a sad condition of ignorance in all things that relate even to the simplest domestic acquirements, and to moral and intellectual progress as well. Such a gracious and self-denying work was possible only as a development of Christianity, for neither Mohammedanism, nor any other religion than that of Jesus Christ, has ever shown the slightest consideration for the neglected women of the East. Mrs. Jamal's efforts to help them began a number of years ago, and she is now devoting her entire energies to this labor of love. At first she gathered in her own home twice a week, a small class for instruction. Their tasks were lightened by the singing of Christian hymns and Bible reading. Much spiritual good has resulted, and many of her former pupils are now noble Christian women, honored mothers of children who are taught to love the Saviour

From Mrs. Jamal's own pen, we have received the following interesting description of her work:

"JERUSALEM, January 15, 1895.

"In writing of our efforts among the poor native girls of Jerusalem, which I first undertook a few years ago, let me begin by explaining the causes that persuaded me to it. The thought had been impressed on my heart many, many times, to do something for some of my poor countrywomen, who never enjoyed the privilege of being brought up in any school. I was educated in the British Syrian school, at Beyrout, and in 1893, was sent by Mrs. Mott, the Superintendent of the school, to Jerusalem as a teacher, under the charge of the Church Missionary Society to open a daily school for the girls. Through God's help and blessing, the girls' school soon was exceedingly flourishing, and I had seventy girls of different creeds as pupils. After two years, I married, and yet school-teaching was my daily thought, as I had taken a deep interest in the girls. With the consent of my husband, and to my joy, I had some of the older girls in my house daily, teaching them hand-work, as well as housework, as they were in great need of training of that character.

"In the years that passed, some of the girls got married, and I had to occupy my time in attending to my own little children until I began this training class. At that time, I used to visit my girls in their own homes, and most of them used frequently to visit me, asking my help in household matters, and whenever they were in perplexity. When visiting some of the married girls (who lived about four or five families in one house), the neighbors would encircle me and beg me to have their daughters trained in my house, as they had observed the difference between their girls and the daughters of their neighbors, in cleanliness, in home management, and as to their children, and in their ability to help their husbands in hard times. My girls had been taught simple domestic ways, and their training had been such as to prove of practical service in sickness, in home management, or in earning a livelihood. There were a few who did so well after marriage that naturally they were envied by the neighbors, and their husbands always praised them—a thing by no means usual in Syrian homes of this class.

"I recall the case of one girl — a former attendant of my class — who was married but bore her husband no children. The husband's mother and sisters urged him to take another wife, according to custom, but he refused, declaring he would never marry another, as he was pleased with his wife's manner and character, her good behavior to him and her skilful management of her home. 'I cannot possibly find in Jerusalem a good, educated wife like her,' he said to his mother. 'Since I married we have never paid a penny for any kind of sewing, and see the pleasant, peaceable life we are living. I would rather be without children than part with my good wife, and may God prolong the life of her mistress by whom she was taught.'

"On another occasion, I was called to the home of one of my girls. I found, to my surprise the room full of women of her relations. After salutations, they opened the subject, saying to me: 'You are her teacher and she respects and obeys you. We want her to be given in marriage.' This girl was an orphan, and had to take care of her two little sisters and a baby brother. She absolutely refused to marry, preferring to fulfil her duties to the little ones. 'The man who wishes to marry her,' said the women, 'has heard how well she is educated, and that she will be a very good woman. He said to his mother, he would pay well for her dowry. And she is

THE GLORIOUS GOSPEL.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, New York. Text: 1. Tim. 1: 11, "According to the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust."

THE greatest novelty of our time is the Gospel. It is so old that it is new. As potters and artists are now attempting to fashion pitchers and cups, and curious ware like those of nineteen hundred years ago recently brought up from buried Pompeii, and such cups, and pitchers, and curious ware are universally admired, so anyone who can unshovel the real Gospel from the mountains of stuff under which it has been buried, will be able to present something that will attract the gaze, and admiration, and adoption of all the people. It is amazing what substitutes have been presented for what my text calls, "The glorious Gospel." There has been an hemispheric apostasy. There are many people in this and all other large assemblages who have no more idea of what the Gospel really is than they have of what is contained in the fourteenth chapter of Zend-Avesta, the Bible of the Hindoo, the first copy of which I ever saw I purchased in Calcutta, India, last September. The old Gospel is fifty feet under, and the work has been done by the shovels of those who have been trying to contrive the Philosophy of Religion. There is no philosophy about it. It is a plain matter of Bible statement, and of childlike faith. Some of the theological seminaries have been hotbeds of infidelity, because they have tried to teach the "Philosophy of Religion." By the time that many a young theological student gets half through his Preparatory Course, he is so filled with doubts about Plenary Inspiration, and the Divinity of Christ, and the questions of eternal Destiny, that he is more fit for the lowest bench in the infant class of a Sunday School than to become a teacher and leader of the people. The ablest theological professor is a Christian mother, who out of her own experience can tell the four-year-old how beautiful Christ was on earth, and how beautiful he now is in heaven, and how dearly he loves little folks, and then she kneels down and puts one arm around the boy, and with her somewhat faded cheek against the roseate cheek of the little one, consecrates him for time and eternity to him who said, "Suffer them to come unto me." What an awful work Paul made with the D.D.'s, and the LL.D.'s, and the F.R.S.'s, when he cleared the decks of the old Gospel ship by saying: "Not many wise men not many noble, are called, but God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty."

There sits the dear old theologian with his table piled up with all the great books on Inspiration, and Exegesis, and Apologetics for the Almighty, and writing out his own elaborate work on the Philosophy of Religion, and his little grandchild coming up to him for a good-night kiss, he accidentally knocks off the biggest book from the table and it falls on the head of the child, of whom Christ himself said: "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise." Ah! my friends, the Bible wants no apologetics. The Throne of the Last Judgment wants no apologetics. Eternity wants no apologetics. Scientists may tell us that natural light is the "propagation of undulations in an elastic medium, and thus set in vibratory motion by the action of luminous bodies;" but no one knows what Gospel Light is until his own blind eyes by the touch of the Divine Spirit have opened to see the noon-day of pardon and peace. Scientists may tell us that natural sound is "the effect of an impression made on the organs of hearing by an impulse of the air, caused by a collision of bodies, or by other means;" but those only know what the Gospel sound is who have heard the voice of Christ directly, saying, "Thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace." The theological dude unrolls upon the plush of the exquisitely carved pulpit a learned discourse showing that the Garden of Eden was an allegory, and Solomon's Song a rather indelicate love ditty, and the Book of Job a drama in which Satan was the star actor, and that Renan was three-quarters right about the miracles of Jesus, and that the Bible was gradually evoluted, and the best thought of the different ages, Moses, and David and Paul doing the best they could under the circumstances, and therefore to be encouraged. Lord of Heaven and Earth, get us out of the London fog of Higher Criticism!

The night is dark and the way is rough, and we have a Lantern which God has put in our hands, but instead of employing that Lantern to show ourselves and others the right way, we are discussing lanterns, their shape, their size, their material, and which is the better light,—kerosene, lamp oil, or candle; and while we discuss it, we stand all around the Lantern, so that we shut out the light from the multitudes who are stumbling on the dark mountains of sin and death. Twelve hundred dead birds were found one morning around Bartholdi's Statue in New York Harbor. They had dashed their life out against the lighthouse the night before. Poor things! And the great Lighthouse of the Gospel—how many high-soaring thinkers have beaten all their religious life out against it, while it was intended for only one thing, and that to show all nations the way into the harbor of God's mercy, and to the crystalline wharves of the Heavenly City, where the immortals are waiting for new arrivals. Dead skylarks, when they might have been flying seraphs.

Here also come, covering up the old Gospel, some who think they can by law and exposure of crime save the world, and from Portland, Maine, across to San Francisco, and back again to New Orleans and Savannah, many of the ministers have gone into the detective business. Worldly reform, by all means; but unless it be also Gospel reform, it will be dead failure. In New York its chief work has been to give us a change of bosses. We had a Democratic boss, and now it is to be a Republican boss, but the quarrel is, who shall be the Republican? Politics will save the cities the same day that Satan evangelizes perdition.

Here comes another class of people who in pulpit and outside of it cover up the Gospel with the theory that it makes no final difference what you believe, or how you act,—you are bound for heaven, anyhow. There they sit, side by side, in heaven: Garfield, and Guiteau, who shot him; Lincoln, and John Wilkes Booth, who assassinated him; Washington, and Thomas Paine, who slandered him; Nana Sahib, and the missionaries, whom he clubbed to death at Cawnpore; Herod, and the children whom he massacred; Paul, and Nero, who beheaded him. As a result of the promulgation of such a mongrel and conglomerate heaven, there are millions of people in Christendom who expect to go straight to heaven from their seraglios, and their inebriation, and their suicides, when among the loudest thunders that break over the basaltic island to which St. John was expatriated, was the one in which God announced that "the abominable, and the murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their place in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." I correct what I said when I declared the Gospel was buried fifty feet deep; it is buried a thousand feet deep. Had the glorious Gospel been given full opportunity, I think before this the world would have had no need of pulpit, or sermon, or prayer, or church, but thanksgiving and hosannas would have resounded in the temple to which the mountains would have been pillars, and the blue skies the dome, and the rivers the baptistery, and all nations the worshippers in the auditorium of the outspread world. But so far from that, as I remarked in the opening sentence of this sermon, the greatest novelty of our time is the Gospel. And let me say to the hundreds and thousands of educated and splendid young men about to enter the Gospel ministry from the theological seminaries of all denominations, on this and the other side of the seas, that there is no drawing power like the glorious Gospel. "Him hath God lifted up to draw all men unto him." Get your souls charged and surcharged with this Gospel, and you will have large audiences, and will not have to announce in order to assemble such audiences, a Sunday night sacred concert, with a brief address by the pastor; or the presence of "Black Pattis," or Creole Minstrels, or some new exposure of Tammany, or a sermon accompanied by a magic lantern, or stereopticon views.

The glorious Gospel of the blessed God as spoken of in my text will have more drawing power, and when that Gospel gets full swing it will have a momentum and a power mightier than that of the Atlantic Ocean, when under the force of the September equinox it strikes the Highlands of the Navesink. The meaning of the word "Gospel" is "good news," and my text says it is glorious good news, and we must tell it in our churches, and over our dry-goods counters, and in our factories, and over our threshing-machines, and behind our ploughs, and on our ships' decks, and in our parlors, our nurseries, and kitchens, as though it were glorious good news, and not with a dismal drawl in our voice, and a dismal look on our faces, as though religion were a rheumatic twinge, or a dyspeptic pang, or a malarial chill, or an attack of nervous prostration. With nine "blesseds" or "happys," Christ began his sermon on the Mount: Blessed the poor; blessed the mourner; blessed the meek; blessed the hungry; blessed the merciful; blessed the pure; blessed the peace-makers; blessed the persecuted; blessed the reviled; blessed, blessed, blessed; happy, happy, happy. Glorious good news for the young as through Christ they may have their coming years ennobled, and for a life-time all the angels of God their coadjutors and all the armies of heaven their allies. Glorious good news for the middle-aged as through Christ they may have their perplexities disentangled, and their courage rallied, and their victory over all obstacles and hindrances made forever sure. Glorious good news for the aged as they may have the sympathy of Him of whom St. John wrote: "His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow," and the defence of the everlasting arms. Glorious good news for the dying as they may have ministering spirits to escort them, and opening gates to receive them, and a sweep of eternal glories to encircle them, and the welcome of a loving God to embosom them.

Oh, my text is right when it speaks of the glorious Gospel. It is an invitation from the most radiant Being that ever trod the earth, or ascended the heavens, to you and me to come and be made happy, and then take after that a Royal Castle for everlasting residence, the angels of God our cup-bearers. The price paid for all of this on the cliff of limestone about as high as this house, about seven minutes' walk from the wall of Jerusalem, where with an Agony that with one hand tore down the rocks, and with the other drew a midnight blackness over the heavens, our Lord set us forever free. Making no apology for anyone of the million sins of our life, but confessing all of them, we can point to that cliff of limestone and say, "There was paid our indebtedness, and God never collects a bill twice." Glad am I that all the Christian poets have exerted their pen in extolling the matchless One of this Gospel. Isaac Watts, how do you feel concerning him? And he writes, "I am not ashamed to own my Lord." Newton, what do you think of this Gospel? And he writes, "Amazing grace, how sweet the sound." Cowper, what do you think of him? And the answer comes, "There is a fountain filled with blood." Charles Wesley, what do you think of him? And he answers, "Jesus, lover of my soul." Horatius Bonar, what do you think of him? And he responds, "I lay my sins on Jesus." Ray Palmer, what do you think of him? And he writes, "My faith looks up to Thee." Fannie Crosby, what do you think of him? And she writes "Blessed assurance, Jesus is mine." But take higher testimony: Solomon, what do you think of him? And the answer is "Lily of the valley." Ezekiel, what do you think of him? And the answer is, "Plant of renown." David, what do you think of him? And the answer is, "My Shepherd." St. John, what do you think of him? And the answer is, "Bright and morning star." St. Paul, what do you think of him? And the answer comes, "Christ is all in all." Do you think as well of him, O man, O woman of the blood-bought immortal spirit? Yes, Paul was right when he styled it "The Glorious Gospel." And then as a druggist, while you are waiting for him to make up the doctor's prescription, puts into a bottle so many grains of this, and so many grains of that, and so many drops of this, and so many drops of that, and the intermixture taken, though sour or bitter, restores to health: so Christ the Divine Physician, prepares this trouble of our lifetime, and that disappointment, and this persecution, and that hardship, and that tear, and we must take the intermixture, yet though it be a bitter draught under the Divine prescription it administers to our restoration and spiritual health. "All things working together for good." Glorious Gospel!

And then the Royal Castle into which one step out of this life, without so much as seeing our foot with the upturned earth of the grave. "They shall reign forever and ever." Does not that mean that you are if saved to be kings and queens, and do not kings and queens have castles? But the one that you are offered was for thirty-three years an abandoned castle, though now gloriously inhabited. There is an abandoned royal castle at Amber, India. One hundred and seventy years ago a king moved out of it never to return. But the castle still stands in indescribable grandeur, and you go through brazen door-way after brazen door-way, and carved room after carved room, and under embellished ceiling and embellished ceiling, and through halls precious-stoned into wider halls precious-stoned, and on that hill are pavillions deeply dyed, and tasselled, and arched, the envy of colored gardens cooled by the snow of white architecture; birds in arabesque so natural to life that while you cannot hear their voices you imagine you see the flutter of their wings while you are passing; walls pictured with triumphal procession; rooms that were called "Alcove of Light," and "Hall of Victory:" marble, white and black like a mixture of morn and night; alals-r, and mother-of-pearl and lacquer-work. tanding before it the eye climbs from step latticed balcony, and from latticed balco- y to oriel, and from oriel to arch, and from ch to roof, and then descends on ladder f all colors, and by stairs of perfect lines tropical gardens of pomegranite, and ne apple. Seven stories of resplendent rchitecture! But the Royal castle provid- d for you, if you will only take it on the rescribed terms, is grander than all that, nd though an abandoned castle while Christ was here achieving your redemp- on is again occupied by the "Chief among en thousand," and some of your own indred who have gone up, and waiting for ou are leaning from the balcony. The indows of that castle look off on the ing's gardens where immortals walk link- d in eternal friendship; and the sup- er is the marriage supper of the Lamb; nd there are fountains into which no tear ver fell, and there is music, and there is he kiss of those re-united after long separa- ion. More nerve will we have there than ow, or we would swoon away under the aptures. Stronger vision will we have there han now, or our eyesight would be blinded y the brilliance. Stronger ear will we have here than now, or under the roll of that ninstrelsy, and the clapping of that acclam- ation, and the boom of that hallelujah we would be deafened. Glorious Gospel! You hought religion was a strait-jacket, that it ut you on the limits, that thereafter you must go cowed down. No, no, no. It is o be castellated. By the cleansing power of the shed blood of Golgotha set your aces toward the shining pinnacles. Oh, it does not matter much what becomes of us here—for at the longest our stay is short—if we can only land there. You see there are so many I do want to meet there. Joshua, my favorite prophet; and John among the evangelists; and Paul among the apostles, and Wycliffe among the martyrs, and Bour- daloue among the preachers, and Dante among the poets, and Havelock among the heroes, and our loved ones whom we have so much missed since they left us, so many darlings of the heart, their absence some- times almost unbearable: and, mentioned in this sentence last of all because I want the thought climacteric, our blessed Lord without whom we could never reach the old Castle at all. He took our place. He pur- chased our ransom. He wept our woes. He suffered our stripes. He died our death. He assured our resurrection. Blessed be his glorious name forever! Surging to his ear be all the anthems! Facing him be all the thrones!

Oh, I want to see it, and I will see it—the day of his coronation. On a throne already; methinks the day will come when in some great hall of eternity all the nations of earth whom he has conquered by his grace will as- semble again to crown him. Wide and high and immense and upholstered as with the sunrises and sunsets of a thousand years, great audience room of heaven. Like the leaves of an Adirondack forest the ransom- ed multitudes, and Christ standing on a high place surrounded by worshippers and subjects. They shall come out of the far- thest past led on by the Prophets: they shall come out of the early Gospel days led on by the Apostles; they shall come out of the centuries still ahead of us, led on by champions of the truth, heroes and hero- ines yet to be born.

And then from that vastest audience ever assembled in all the universe there will go up the shout, "Crown Him! Crown Him! Crown Him!" and the Father who long ago promised this his only begotten Son, "I will give thee the heathen for thine in- heritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession" shall set the crown upon the forehead yet scarred with Crucifixion bramble, and all the hosts of heaven, down on the levels, and up in the galleries will drop on their knees crying, "Hail king of earth! King of heaven! King of saints! King of seraphs! Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and to thy dominions there shall be no end! Amen and Amen! Amen and Amen!"

Training Poor Syrian Girls.

truly very clever in sewing and doing fancy work.' 'Certainly I cannot force the girl to marry against her will, otherwise the three little ones will be neglected,' said I. 'She is quite right in her determination.'

"These and many similar incidents de- lighted my heart, as they were the fruits of my labor. Then came the thought that I might be still more useful to my country- women, in teaching them many useful things, and bringing them nearer to civili- zation and a higher plane of living more pleasing to God. Could my ears be shut and my heart remain solid as a stone and not help them! At the time I was greatly grieved and regretted my inability to do what I wished; yet I felt that a great re- sponsibility was upon me.

"A few years passed away, but the pic- ture was ever before my eyes and impressed upon my heart. At last there came a time when I felt that I could undertake this im- portant work, as I could devote time and room in my house for the benefit of these poor girls; but, alas! I had not the means needed to start the work. Fortunately I received the help of a famous and benevo- lent Englishman, who offered to furnish the necessary funds for one year of training for eight girls. I soon prepared sufficient material for a start and added a small stock of religious books. On the first Tuesday, after the New Year's day, 1893, the open- ing of my training class took place. When the girls were gathered, I read a chapter from the Bible and asked the blessing of God on the undertaking. Each girl had her allotted work, and two were appointed to prepare the luncheon and do the cooking. The class was to meet twice a week, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m.; and the programme included use- ful house-work, hand-work, and native fancy-work; the housework included coooking, cleaning, ironing, etc.; the handwork, cutting out, sewing, patching, darning, etc.; the fancy work, gold em- broidery on velvet cushions, tea cases, belts, work-bags, tea-table covers, silk em- broidery on muslin and Indian silk for anti- macassars, needle-work, lace and doylies, etc. All money received from contributions and from selling the product was to be ex- pended in paying the girls for their work, buying new material, furnishing a simple lunch, if possible procuring clothing, which was greatly needed by most of the girls, and helping them with medicine when any were taken sick.

"We always begin the class with the reading of a portion of the Bible, followed by a short prayer. When work has fairly started and all are at their places, I read for them from some religious book, to in- terest them, and by enlightening their minds bring them nearer to the Saviour, as the children in Christian lands are brought to know God and to understand their du- ties one to another. I also teach them some verses by heart, as well as the words and music of simple hymns. When at home, they repeat to their parents what they have heard. The Lord's prayer is repeated in unison when closing the class for the day.

That the result of training these girls has fully justified the labor, I have had many proofs at different times. The father of one girl—a noted drunkard—was changed to a sober, and, I believe, a good man, by hear- ing his daughter repeat at home the Gospel lessons she learned in the class. This girl taught her brothers all the verses and hymns. Another girl, the daughter of a widow, is now a successful dressmaker and supporting her mother and sister. She has exerted a good influence at home. Her mother tells me that she asks God's bless- ing morning and evening and they join in the prayers. Still another girl, aged twenty- two, came to the class with an idea of only learning fancy work. She came in opposi- tion to the will of her father who did not believe females should be educated, as some of the native men hold that girls have no right to leave their fathers' houses to learn anything. When the father of this girl leaves in the morning for business, she comes privately to the class. The girl has a step-mother with whom she was con- stantly quarreling, using very profane lan- guage. After coming to the class for a time, the girl underwent a great change in character and behavior. Her step-mother paid me a visit and expressed her thanks for the change in her step-daughter and said that her father also himself saw a great difference in her and had changed his opinion as to consent to her coming to the class, and he even allowed her younger sis- ter to accompany her. I was greatly pleased at the change in her father's attitude. He now regrets that his wife was not trained in such a class, and he asked if I could take his brother's wife, as she is only sixteen, I have done so, and have now consequently three of that household in the class. There is no more rough and profane talk in that home, but all live together in harmony and peace.

"The departure of our benefactor, who largely supplied funds for this work, made the continuance of the training class a per- plexing problem. While here last year, Mrs. Terhune greatly encouraged me by her kind advice. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD also, has aided me materially, and the result of its occasional references to the work has shown me that there are a great many Chris- tian American ladies who take a deep inter- est in my simple efforts for these poor Syri- an girls. I have received some contribu- tions sent to me direct, and others sent through Dr. Louis Klopsch, which have en- abled me to defray the cost of training nine of the girls. The full class number up to the close of 1894 was fourteen girls, so there has been a deficiency of funds equal to the tuition of five girls during the year. At the beginning of 1895, believing that the work will be aided by Christian people sufficient- ly to meet all needs, I have promised to add to the class several more girls, selecting from among many applicants only a few of the most deserving. As the work has been wholly one of faith hitherto, I am encour- aged to trust the Lord to find ways and means for its continuance and development. In closing, let me present my hearty thanks to all the benefactors of these girls in the past year, and may the Almighty reward them for the loving help extended to those who might otherwise live and die neglected and unenlightened."

"Very faithfully yours, REBECCA JAMAL."

It was suggested some time ago in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that if twelve "cir- cles" were formed, each contributing twen- ty dollars a year, the result would be suf- ficient to enable Mrs. Jamal to continue the work in Jerusalem and to receive a larger number of pupils. Several responses have already been received from American ladies, who are willing to bear a share of the bur- den in carrying forward this most gracious and helpful mission of a godly Syrian wo- man among her countrywomen. Any aid rendered to this worthy cause by our read- ers can be sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A SUITOR AS PHYSICIAN.

The two medical missionaries in Damas- cus, Drs. Smith and Mackinnon, had for a long time been trying to secure a site for their dispensary and hospital. The man with whom they were in treaty for a suit- able piece of land took advantage of the mazes of Turkish law, all antagonistic to Christian litigants to cheat them out of their rights. The local cadi or judge was slow to act against a Mohammedan in fav- or of a Christian and the matter dragged along wearily in true Oriental fashion.

One day after many hours' work the doctor was sitting down to dinner when an officer of the court rushed in "Dakheclak! Dakheclak? Have pity, come at once," he gasped out. "The cadi's little boy, his dearly beloved, is very, very ill."

Away the doctor went at once to the call of duty and of mercy.

He found him a little lad of three years, suffering from opium poisoning. All the household was in alarm. There the boy lay, livid and well-nigh pulseless.

Now began a struggle with death. For full two hours the good doctor fought and wrought, stimulating the dying boy, and keeping up constant artificial respiration. A hard and anxious fight it was, but in the end death was routed. Slowly the flicker- ing signs of life grew stronger and steadier, until at last anxiety began to lose itself in gratitude and praise to God. The boy was out of danger.

Oh, the feelings of the father's heart! Tears were in his eyes; he embraced the doctor. In his strange foreign way he ex- pressed his thanks. "All my life," he said, "I shall be your debtor." From that day he began to display a new interest in the pending lawsuit, and in the succeeding stages of the case he has done all he could to secure justice. The question is not yet finally settled, but the prospects are now as bright as they were formerly gloomy.

A Female Fakir's Conversion.

Brought to Christ through the Instru- mentality of a Little Native Convert.

WRITING of their missionary work in India and Ceylon, Misses Mary and Margaret Leitel, the two devoted mis- sionaries, relate this inci- dent: Topsy was the name given playfully by a mis- sionary in Midnapore, In- dia, to a little girl in the orphan- age. One Sabbath, when the missionary was preaching about Christ's death on the cross for us, he no- ticed Topsy, usually so restlestlees, sitting strangely quiet, and two great tears gather- ing in her lustrous eyes, which were fixed upon him. That night Topsy gave her heart to the Saviour who had so loved her as to lay down his life for her. The mis- sionary and his wife rejoiced that night that their labors had not been in vain. She asked and obtained permission to go out every day after school hours with an aged Bible-woman, to help her to teach the Bible lessons and Christian hymns to the Zenana women whom she visited.

One day as they were going through the streets, the little girl walking a step or two behind the Bible-woman, Topsy espied a very strange-looking object seated by the roadside on a tiger skin. It was a fakir woman. Topsy sat down beside her and asked her if she had ever heard about Christ. The fakir woman said she had not, so Topsy began to tell her the story, but before she had finished, the Bible-wom- an, who had gone on for some distance without missing Topsy, came back to look for her in some alarm, and when she found her, blamed her for stopping behind. Topsy in great distress said to the fakir woman, "I can't stop to tell you the rest now, but if you will come to the house where the missionary lives, this evening, he will be at home then, and he will tell you all about it much better than I can. Be sure to come. I will tell him to expect you."

The missionary received the stranger kindly, and when she was seated, told her about Christ and what he had done for us. He discovered that she was a Brahminee named Chandra Lilavati, and possessed a remarkable education, being able to read in four different languages, viz: Nepalese, Origa, Bengalee, and Hindi, and familiar with many of the sacred books of the Hin- dus. Her husband, who had been a noted man, a learned Brahmin Pundit, had in- structed her, and since his death she had wandered during many years all over India on pilgrimages, visiting numerous shrines and temples, and everywhere she was wor- shipped as a goddess. The missionary gave her a Gospel in the language most familiar to her, and she went away, only to return again and again to learn more, until she was led to believe in Jesus as the Son of God and to accept him as her Saviour. On the day when she publicly professed her faith and was baptized, throngs of people came to witness the ceremony, and to see her whom they had formely worshipped as a goddess renounce all her worldly honors and privileges, and give up her lucrative profession to become a humble Christian.

After this she begged to be allowed to come daily while the missionary was in- structing his class of young theological students, and to listen to his words. When the students were ready to enter upon their work, the missionary said to the woman, "If you would like to become a Bible-woman, I would provide you with a house and give you a salary sufficient to meet your living expenses;" but she answered, "No, no, I must go back, and in every city where I have told the wrong story, I must tell the right one." And she who had so long been an object of worship, and received every honor and attention, lifted up and placed on her head the heavy basket of Bibles and tracts and religious books which she had begged the missionary to supply her, and started on foot, though an old woman with white hair, to revisit the cities she had pre- viously visited, and put right what in igno- rance she had put wrong.

The missionary heard of her from time to time in Calcutta, Burdwan, Monghir, Lucknow, Cawnpore, Delhi, and other cities in India, the missionaries in these places writing that she had visited them and greatly revived and stimulated their native Christian people by her presence and words, causing great astonishment among the Hindus who had formerly known and wor- shipped her as a holy and learned fakir.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

S. S. Lesson for March 3. John 11: 30-45. Golden Text 11: 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT was while Jesus was engaged with a few learning followers that Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, fell sick, and the sisters sent a message, in terms which meant much to him and much to them, just at this time of his increasing rejection: "He whom thou lovest is sick." "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby." Such was the only, but the significant answer. Let us learn from what follows. "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus;" the sisters were not wrong in their message to the Master: "He whom thou lovest is sick." But to the human ideas it sounds strange that the sequence should be: "When therefore—

Because He Loved Them—

He heard that he was sick, he abode at that time, two days in the place where he was." He did not hurry to his sick friend or to the tried sisters, but remained where he was, as though the tending of the few around him were of more consequence in his eyes than what concerned the family in Bethany. Jesus was laying himself open apparently to the criticisms of the Jews who could not understand how that, possessing the power to heal, he should not intervene on behalf of his friend; he was apparently giving ground to the subsequent reproach of both Martha and Mary: "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." He could not explain, even to the disciples; all looked so strange. And yet the Word of God declares that he acted out of love! Because he loved them he honored them by putting them to the proof, he could trust this family as he could not others But this was not all: he knew what his disciples had not yet been able to understand, that his ministry was drawing to an end, he was about to work the miracle which should bring about the crisis which should lead to the supreme act of man's rejection of him, the Christ of God: and, more than ever before, he must go forward, unhindered by any earthly consideration, free from any pressure from beneath, of man or of circumstances.

After two days he said: "Let us go into Judea again." The disciples understood him so little that they replied: "Rabbi, the Jews were but now seeking to stone thee; and goest thou thither again?" Disciples at least should understand that the life of the Christ of God was by any fear of man or fear of death It could never be a reason for him to go hither or thither that thereby he should escape death"; he knew the hours of the day by the daylight in which he walked, the full consciousness of pleasing his Father in all things. "Are there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of the world." He was not stumbling, but walking in the sure way of his Father's will, which was the light of the world in which he lived. In such a light the approval of man ceases to be a necessity.

But strange as might seem to the disciples the action of their Master at this time, they had clear proof that it was not the result of indifference. He said to them: "Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep." (R.V.) What then, was he, after all, not indifferent to Lazarus, and yet he would let things come to the worst? Yes; Jesus could afford to let things come to the extreme, but he could not afford to do one thing without the clearest direction from above. The disciples could not conceive that their Master would let Lazarus die; they only thought he spoke of taking rest in sleep: "Lord, if he sleep he shall do well;" the crisis of his sickness would have passed. "Then Jesus said unto them plainly: Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe; nevertheless, let us go unto him." Peter, James and John had seen their Master raise the daughter of Jairus; yet not one of them seemed to connect the former manifestations of Christ's power with the present emergency, and Thomas went so far as to say to his fellow disciples: "Let us also go that we may die with him!" Had all the teaching, had all the works of Jesus produced so little an effect even on his chosen twelve that they remained under the power of things seen and temporal still, and never conceived that he, who had before raised the dead, could and would do the same again? But is their unbelief more incomprehensible than that of a sleeping, lukewarm, Laodicean church in our own day, which, with the glorious hope of the Lord's return to take to himself, without dying, them "that wait for him unto salvation," to be his chosen Bride, yet remains indifferent, earthly-minded, more occupied with death than with resurrection, and with things present, rather than with this coming glory?

Jesus had sent a message to the beloved family of Bethany: "This sickness is but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby:" And yet Lazarus was dead! How could they understand it? Martha having heard that Jesus was coming, went out and met him, but it was with the reproach, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" And yet she added: "And even now, I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give thee." "Thy brother shall rise again." Was this what Jesus had asked and obtained? Martha was too full of her own thoughts to take it in; her mind was filled with the fact of her brother's death after Jesus had said: "This sickness is not unto death." She was, in fact, condemning Jesus in her heart; things were so different to her expectations So she put off to the future the meaning of the Master's word, and said, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Oh, how like a half-awake church which puts off the hope of the Lord's return until this or that has happened, and does not take as a reality for to-day, that his coming may be at even or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning and the life he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live and whoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die" Such was the answer of Jesus with the personal application: "Believest thou this?" The disciples had not believed nor even understood when he said, "I go to wake him out of sleep," and now Martha does not understand, and she falls back upon her past faith. "Yea, Lord, I have believed that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, even he that cometh into the world." Would Mary believe? Would there be one who understood him? Martha went to tell her sister: "The Master is come and calleth for thee." And she arose quickly and went to meet him But even she had sat at his feet and heard his Word, she who anointed him for his burial, even Mary met him with the same reproach as Martha: "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died!"

"I am the Resurrection.

Jesus Groaned in the Spirit and wept. Had it come to this that he had come down from heaven to save man, that he had taken infinite pains with his disciples to instruct them about his coming sufferings, death and resurrection; he had taught the little family in Bethany as beloved and closely united friends, and now was there not one who could stand the tremendous test of faith with which he had honored them?

When Jesus came to the tomb, his first word was: "Take ye away the stone." There was a heavy stone of unbelief manifest in the reply of Martha: "Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days." "Said I not unto thee, that if thou believedst, thou shouldst see the glory of God?" Jesus had said to her: "Thy brother shall rise again," but even now she did not understand. And he cried with a loud voice: "Lazarus, come forth." Now the sisters understood, but they had failed the master under the severe test to which he had put them. But his work was accomplished. "He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes, and his face bound with a napkin."

"TAKE YE AWAY THE STONE."

GOING up to Jerusalem in December of the last year of his earthly life, Jesus stayed at the house of the family at Bethany, which was about two miles out of the city. The family consisted of Lazarus and his two sisters. Whether this was Christ's first visit to them we are not told, but their reverent familiarity and certain incidental expressions imply previous acquaintance. Lazarus does not appear to have been at home. He was probably in Jerusalem keeping the feast of Dedication. Incidentally it is worthy of notice how much there must have been in Christ's life that has not been recorded. We are not told that Jesus ever met Lazarus, yet, a few weeks later, when he fell ill, his sisters sent a message to Jesus showing that not only did he know him, but loved him. It is remarkable, too, that only one of the four Evangelists should have recorded this astounding miracle of his resurrection, which no ordinary biographer would have left unmentioned. After the feast, the hostility of the Jerusalem priests and governing body being so pronounced, Jesus retired across the Jordan to Bethabara, about thirty miles away. He, doubtless wished, perceiving that he could not hope much longer to escape the jealous fury of the authorities, to have a period of comparative retirement with his disciples, that he might instruct them and prepare them for the work that he wanted them to take up after his death. While he was in the Perean region, he delivered that wonderful series of talks which Luke records in the fourteenth to the seventeenth chapters of his Gospel. It was more advanced teaching than he had ever yet given to them and we can imagine how intently the disciples would listen. While he was still there, a messenger comes to tell him that Lazarus is sick. Jesus does not hurry to him that he might heal him, as Martha, Mary and the disciples doubtless expected. He intends that they shall learn, before he is taken from them, that he is not only able to cure disease but to raise the dead. So he waits in Perea until Lazarus is dead and buried. The time was near when all the future of Christianity would depend on their faith in him. He wanted them to see with their own eyes and to be fully assured that they were justified in preaching him to the world. So he continues his teaching, and does not go to Bethany until Lazarus has been four day in the rocky tomb in which he had been laid. Then he works the miracle which is the subject of the lesson. Probably all his disciples witnessed it as well as the Jews. The memory of that scene must have been strong in them in after life, and would give them confidence when they proclaimed Jesus to the world and declared his power to impart life. They were to declare to the world that Jesus was able to give spiritual life to men who were dead in sin, and they could not doubt his power to do this after they had seen him give life to a man who had been four days in the grave.

If thou wouldest only believe. There would be less sorrow in bereavement if people would only believe. Faraday relates in one of his letters a coincidence which was very comforting to an observant mind. He says that he was much interested in the simple memorials on the graves of the poor in the churchyard of Oberhofen in Switzerland. In one instance the relatives had not been able to afford even the plain wooden slab bearing name and date, which marked most of the graves. But affection could not let the grave go unmarked. The poor little story had been written with ordinary ink on a piece of card, which was stuck in a cleft stick. The stick was thrust in the soil at the head of the grave, in such a way that the card it bore would be protected from rain by the overhanging cornice of the wall. Just at the junction of the card and cornice was a recess which a caterpillar had chosen as the retreat in which to undergo its change into a butterfly. The cocoon was there still, and in it the empty skin of the caterpillar which had been burst asunder when the lovely winged creature emerged into its new life. Why, thought the naturalist, should not the same change have taken place in the grave below. There, too, was the outward form, like the caterpillar's skin, left behind with nothing to indicate the nature of the creature into which it was changed.

He that was dead came forth. "I remember," says a great writer, "when I was a young man being allowed as a great privilege to visit the studio of a famous sculptor. We almost worshipped that man for the wonderful genius which could produce from a block of marble statues of such wondrous grace. When I went to his studio there was a statue of a great Italian statesman standing there just finished. The likeness, the attitude, the expression were absolutely perfect. We could not say enough in its praise, or think too much of the master whose cunning hand had called it out of the dead block. Since then I have ceased to worship the sculptor, for all my worship with all my heart has gone to him who brings beauty out of corruption and puts life into the dead."

Take ye away the stone. "I do not approve of your philanthropic work," said a clergyman to a Quaker whose efforts for the amelioration of the condition of poor had cost him thousands of dollars. "A Christian man's duty," he went on "is, I think to look after the spiritual good of the people. You would have done better to spend your money in Bibles and tracts than in building these lodging houses and free baths." The Quaker shook his head. He said, "I am a plain, simple man and cannot preach or teach, but I can help them in my own way. I am like the man that Jesus ordered to take away the stone at the grave of Lazarus. They cannot listen to thee while they are living so miserably. They are crushed under their burdens; their dirt and foul-smelling houses were a barrier to religion. They cannot think about it. I am just taking away the stone."

Jesus wept. Why did he weep when he knew that he was about to restore the lost one to his sorrowing family. One word explains it—sympathy. A minister had in his congregation a lady who gave large sums away in charity. He was surprised however, to find how few people spoke well of her. He was curious to know the reason and one day, when visiting a widow who as he knew had received several handsome gifts from her, he introduced the lady's name. "Yes, sir," said the widow "she has been very generous. I am very grateful to her. The money was very welcome." There was no enthusiasm. But when he mentioned the name of another lady, the widow's eyes lighted up. "Oh," she said, "I love her. She is really good she must have a good heart." The minister noticed the contrast, and said: "But she never gives you anything; she is too poor Why do you love her, while you are only grateful to Mrs. B.? The widow had no difficulty in explaining. She said: "When my husband died, Mrs. B. gave me money but she was very hard. But when Mrs. M. came, though she did not give me anything she cried with me and was sorry for me and I wanted sympathy most."

Back from Scenes of Suffering.

'. Klopsch Tells the Story of his Three-Weeks' Tour Among the Destitute Sections of Nebraska, Colorado and Kansas– A Great Relief Work under Way, but Thousands yet Appealing for Help—Kansas Calls for Food and Clothing.

AS the reports received from the West are so contradictory as regards the status of the people in the drouth-stricken districts, it may, perhaps, be not altogether without interest to our readers to hear something n that subject from Dr. Klopsch, who has st returned from a three-weeks' tour rough Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado, ade for the sole purpose of ascertaining e actual condition of the people, in behalf whom appeals had been made time and gain, and of affording aid to the most edy ones, through the Relief Fund gen-ously contributed by the readers of this urnal. He says:

"In distributing the Relief Fund entrusted my charge, I have kept two important jects constantly in view, viz.: (1), to ach and relieve, as expeditiously as pos-ble, those sections where the suffering was e sharpest, and (2), to create new centres Christian work at advantageous points hich, with the momentum afforded by HE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, would ex-and to wider proportions of usefulness, the work we had begun. The ontributions of $1000 each t) ie 'World-Herald,' of Omaha, Republican,' of Denver, and Capital,' of Topeka, were of is character, and those three ournals, aided by generous con-ibutions in their respective lo-alities, are now pushing the ork of relief with a zeal and nthusiasm that promise excel nt results among the sufferers, esides affording thousands of enevolently-disposed people an pportunity of sharing in a work hat is fraught with blessing to ll concerned. I need hardly tate that the appropriations rom the Fund, of $5000 to be istributed through the Ne-raska State Relief Commis-ion, $500 for a Tea, Coffee and ugar Fund for aged and invalid ufferers, $1000 to Rev. Dr. Hun-ington, to be apportioned among he destitute by the pastors of he Western Nebraska Confer-nce, and $1000 for the relief of Nebraska G. A. R. veterans, have all been promptly and faith-ully applied to the purposes in-licated and a great amount of wretchedness has been relieved.

Through Three States.

"In the carrying out of this work I have traveled more than half way through Nebraska, throughout the entire length of Kansas, and through Colorado as far as Denver. While the whole State of Nebraska has suffered an entire failure of crops—a condition of things without prece-there for at least thirty years—the Eastern portion of it is abundantly able to stand the loss. The middle section of the State has required, and will still require some little as-sistance in the way of food for man and beast, and very much help in the matter of seed grain. The Western third of the State, notwithstanding the oft-repeated denials which are sent out from the Eastern part of the State, is almost entirely destitute, and the great suffering of the population can-not find adequate expression in anything short of actual experience. It is safe to say that, in territory covering about twenty counties, there are at least 30,000 people who are practically living altogether on charity, and who, moreover, deserve chari-ty. They are not poor because of their own shiftlessness, but simply because nature has repeatedly denied them that return for hon-est labor which they had a right to expect.

Great Suffering Ahead in Nebraska.

"To go into detail would be harrowing to the reader, and would require more space than pressure of other matter will admit; but these selfsame 30,000 will be in the same condition for the next six months, and at least three times that number will be added. Clothing contributed by charitable people North, East, West and South, has reached in sufficient quantity to meet the most ur-gent requirements for the present. Hence, that particular phase of relief work has been well looked after, and further efforts in that direction for Nebraska may be dis-continued with safety. What is wanted is food for man and beast, fuel and seed grain. Unless these people get food, they will starve. Unless they get fuel, they will freeze, and unless they get seed grain they will become paupers, which at present they are emphatically not. The seed grain ques-tion has, to a large extent, been satisfac-torily handled by the State. While I was in Lincoln, the bill appropriating $50,000 for that purpose passed the Senate, and the Governor told me that on the same day the bill reached him, he would promptly sign it. This money will be used not so much for the grain itself as for transportation, the Relief Committees established at different centres being able to 'rustle' i.e., beg enough grain from the more prosperous counties, and even outside of the State, to supply that indispensable article, and the appropriation will enable them to have it brought to con-venient places for distribution. Ten times the amount appropriated would not buy both grain and transportation. Of food there is, on the most economical basis of calculation, enough at the different relief centres to sup-ply ten days' demand, and perhaps enough on the way, in store-houses or side-tracked, for a week more, but the contributions are decreasing, owing to the unfounded reports that the wants had all been met and no fur-ther contributions were desired. Of fuel there is fortunately enough at hand and in sight to admit of comfort in one room in each of the comfortless homes for a month to come, owing to the very generous action on the part of miners and railroads who, in many instances, have jointly contributed the coal, the mining and the transportation. This leaves the food and fodder question as the most important, the fuel question as secondary, the seed grain question as a hopeful one, and the clothing question as solved.

State Relief Yet Far Off.

The State of Nebraska, because of the limitations in its debt-contracting ability im-posed by the Constitution of the state, can-not come to the relief of these people, a fact greatly deplored by Governor Holcomb and Nebraska legislators. A change of the Constitution cannot be brought about in time to be of any advantage to the suffer-ers; therefore, charity alone can solve the problem, and charity must do it till harvest time. Owing to the snow which has fal-len in large quantities in the state, the pros-pects of a bountiful crop were never brighter or better than this year, and with one good crop these people will be abundantly able to take care of themselves. It is a harrow-ing thing to read of shoeless feet out in the piercing cold, treading the frozen snow on the plains of Nebraska, and of mothers and daughters having but one present-able dress among them, and of chil-dren crying for bread with nothing in the house to quiet them, and of men so poorly clad as to render them unfit to walk the streets of New York even on an April day with any degree of comfort. There are thousands of such cases to be found in these counties of Nebraska, where people stay in bed to hide their nakedness, and, if possible, to sleep away the hunger that cannot be appeased; but I will not stop for descriptions of that kind.

"At one station I jumped off the train while it stopped there for a minute or two, and on the platform I saw a man who look-ed like an honest Western farmer, and opened up conversation with him, asking him how things were in the neighborhood. He told me that times were very hard, and that the people had had no crops for two years. I said that as they had been pros-perous in the past, the loss of crops for a few years would probably not seriously af-fect them. The last thing he said before I jumped on the train was that 'more than half of that town did not know where they would get breakfast to-morrow morning!'

Kansas' Hour of Need.

"Kansas is like unto Nebraska in its ex-treme western portion, with the exception that they need clothing in addition to all that Nebraska wants, and need it badly. While the people in the eastern portion have en-deavored to delude themselves with the belief that Kansas farmers were well taken care of, the suffering went on and on and on until at last it became so unbearable, that the cry for help could not be stifled, and it as-sumed in a very short time such tremen-dous proportions, that the Topeka 'Daily Capital' which, in the last week of Janu-ary, contained an editorial denying the ex-istence of want in Kansas, on February 5th made an earnest appeal for help in its columns, closing as follows:

"'Our State pride may rebel a little against accepting these kind offers, but the first thing for us to do, as sensible people, is to relieve the suffering of our citizens, who are making a brave struggle to hold their homes and settle in Western Kansas, and then after the trouble is over and the good crops once more come to bring plenty to those now suffering, we shall easily patch the holes in our pride and be happier because we did our duty in their hour of need.'

"This morning, I am in receipt of a tele-gram from Major Hudson, managing edit-or of 'The Capital,' which says 'the situa-tion grows more serious upon investigation. Send me what money and clothing you can spare for this territory.'

The Distress in Colorado.

"In Colorado, the Relief movement has been so well organized that the six counties which have been suffering in the past, will hereafter be well taken care of by more prosperous portions of that State. The 'Denver Republican' is soliciting contribu-tions, the list being headed by $1,000, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund and three car-loads of clothing. Governor McIntyre of Colorado, is a wide-awake, energetic of-ficer, who is personally and deeply inter-ested in the relief work, and has promised to give it official and personal encourage-ment. The total number of families sorely distressed in Colorado is about 1800.

"Sections of South Dakota, almost the entire territory of Oklahoma, and the North-ern part of Texas, are similarly afflicted, and before long we may expect to receive pathet-ic and well-founded appeals from the entire section that suffered from the terrible drouth of last summer.

"Let those that have not yet contributed, do their share, and those who have already given, let them, if possible, double their gifts."

LOUIS KLOPSCH.

Many Pastors Aiding the Work.

A large number of suffering families are now being helped with the gift of $1000 paid over from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund to Rev. D. W. C. Huntington at Lincoln, a week ago. Dr. Huntington, who has charge of the relief work conduct-ed by the Nebraska Conference, apportioned the $1000 among the following distributors:

PRESIDING ELDERS.

Rev. D. Marquette, Neligh, Neb.	$160 00
Rev. C. A. Hale, Holdredge, Neb	250.00
Rev. A. R. Julian, Chadron, Neb.	120.00
Rev. Eras. Smith, Kearney, Neb.	180.00
Rev. Alf. Hodgetts, Norfolk, Neb.	50.00
Rev. D. K. Tindall, Grand Is., Neb.	80.00
Rev. J. Leonard, N. Platte, Neb.	160 00

These amounts, given at the darkest period of the distress, will doubtless be the means of relieving much suffering.

Among the multitude of notable contributions to the relief movement, sent direct by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the scenes of suffering, should be mentioned that of the kind-hearted Christian people of Yu-ton, Ill. Yuton is a small place, with a grain-elevator and a post-office, but its big-hearted men and women have donated $200 in money and sent two carloads of corn and provisions to the sufferers. The Ladies' Relief Committe of Warren, Pa., sent to various points in Nebraska eleven barrels of clothing and $50 in money in a week, and are still sending. The good people of Crayton, N. Dak., have col-lected a carload of flour and sev-eral barrels of clothing and for-warded them to Nebraska. The towns-people of Apollo, Pa., have sent $100 in money, and over $1000 worth of clothing to Nebraska.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, our Sun-Missionary, who has charge of the Fund distribution in Kansas, writes that he has received and distributed a carload of clothing and supplies among the destitute at Almena, Kan.

Reports of relief work performed have been received from the following Volunteer Distributors in Kansas:

Mary C. Taylor, Bird City, (all denominations sup-plied,; Rev. D. E. Dodge, Almena (over eighty fam-ilies relieved); Mrs. Thomas Doctor, Scandia (one of the gifts recorded by this distributor—a doll—goes to a little sick girl of five who never owned a dollie); Mrs. M. A. Brewer, Brownell; Mrs. A. Weis-ner, Bird City; Mrs. Florence Hurley, Bird City (many families helped); Mrs. Clara R. Pence, Macks-ville (some of the clothing she received was sent twenty miles to needy families); John P. Anderson, Thornton (several families relieved); J. W. Briney, Atwood; Lavinia Weld, Colby; J. A. Carl, Ashland,

As this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, Mr. Hudson, manag-ing editor of the "Capital," Topeka, sends this urgent plea for help for Kansas:

I find upon investigation that the necessities of the people of our extreme western counties have been underestimated. The demand upon me for flour, meal, and clothing is beyond my ability to supply. Your visit stirred our energies in a new direction, and I believe thousands of people will bless you for your noble charitable work. We are in the midst of the most severe storm of the winter, as I write. I am pushing the supplies out and will be able to get off six carloads by the end of the week. The Fund grows slowly. The demands on our people, even here in the Eastern side of the state, have been so constant that their contributions are small. If we can arouse the communities, they will make up carloads, but the suffering must be helped at once, and it all seems to go slow. Now that I have taken hold of this work, I want to do something of real value to the people in western Kansas. If you can ship us several carloads of clothing to Chicago, I will take them from that point. Further, if you can send me more money I will see that every cent is made to do a good work. The $1000 was all used in buying flour and meal which I secured below wholesale trade prices.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

ABDICATION IN HAWAII.

REPUBLICAN institutions in Hawaii are strengthened by the issue of the document a copy of which reached this country on Feb. 6th. It is the formal abdication of the deposed Queen, Liliuokalani, and her voluntary recognition of the Republican government. There is nothing dubious or equivocal in the instrument. The Queen declares "the late Hawaiian monarchy final- and forever ended and no longer of any legal or actual validity, force, or effect whatsoever," and she further absolves every one of the islands from "all and every manner of allegiance, or official obligation or duty" to her and her heirs forever, and assures them that it is their duty to support the government of the Republic of Hawaii. For herself she takes the oath of allegiance and promises that she will loyally support the new constitution. The Queen was under arrest when the document was executed. In investigating the origin of the conspiracy which was discovered on January 6th, sufficient evidence was secured to prove that the Queen was aware of the project to restore her to the throne if she did not institute it. There were also grounds for believing that she supplied the funds for the purchase of arms for the insurgents. She was accordingly arrested and confined in one of the suites of apartments in the royal palace. Her abdication was probably executed with the object of securing clemency for herself and her followers, of whom 310 are now in prison for participating in the rebellion. Although it does not change the situation, as there was small chance of the Queen ever regaining her throne, the abdication may prevent any further insurrections and is so far a gain to the Republic. The Queen simply accepts the inevitable and bows to the will of the people as expressed in the revolution of January, 1893. It probably cost her a severe struggle to sign such a document. To renounce her own claims to govern and to promise to obey the new government must have involved a sacrifice of pride and ambition which would not be easily made. Many a man has been unwilling to make the sacrifice even to save his soul. Some who have been very near to the kingdom of God have turned back when they found that they were required to make a full surrender of their own will and the conduct of their lives, and yield themselves unreservedly to God's goverment. (Mark 10 : 21, 22.)

Burnt Money Redeemed.

A farmer in Pennsylvania has been saved from a serious loss by a very narrow chance. Several weeks before Christmas his wife was notified that a legacy had been left to her. When the estate was settled, her share was found to be $280, and this amount she collected. She took it home, and as the farmer had not a bank account, they decided to hide it where thieves would not be likely to find it if they broke into the house. They put the bills into a tin box and concealed it in the side of a stove which stood in a disused room. It seemed to be quite safe there, but an unforseen event put it in peril. The farmer's children had a party of young visitors in the holidays, and the unused room was utilized as a play-room. It occurred to the children that the room would be warmer if they made a fire in the old stove, and they speedily collected bits of wood about the house, and without informing their parents of their project, laid the fire and lighted it. The dismay of their mother when she discovered what had been done may be imagined. The precious tin box was extricated and its contents examined. The bills had been reduced to a few charred pieces of paper and a quantity of ashes. At first they feared it would be a total loss, but they were advised to send the box and its contents to the United States Treasury, with an affidavit reciting the circumstances. This was done, and last week they had the satisfaction of receiving the full amount of the burned notes. By a process known to themselves the Treasury officials had satisfied themselves that the ashes and fragments really did represent the amount claimed. No tradesman or banker would have accepted the ashes as money, but at the fountain-head they were recognized and correctly appreciated. It may be so with true religion. At the last day some will probably be found among the sheep whose religious experience would not have satisfied any church, but has satisfied him who seeth the heart. (Matt. 8 : 11, 12.)

The Fall of a Smoke-stack.

A contractor in New York had an arduous piece of work undone a few days ago in a curious manner. He had undertaken to erect a huge smoke-stack of steel, to use in connection with the mammoth boiler which was brought to New York from the Chicago exhibition. The stack is five feet in diameter, eighty feet high and weighs several tons. It had been set up and was held in place by guy ropes until it could be secured by strong fastenings to the wall of the building. Before all the fastenings were put in, there came a heavy fall of snow followed by rain, which caused the guy ropes to shrink. It then became a trial of strength between the ropes and such of the joints as had already been put in place. It was decided in favor of the ropes. One after another the joints were torn out of the wall and finally the huge stack was pulled over and fell with a crash. Happily no one was hurt, but the contractor's work was undone and the stack will have to be set up again. It was strange that the very apparatus which was applied to prevent the stack falling should have caused its fall. It is sometimes so with character. The only effective safeguard is the eternal principle of right and truth. When parents try to keep their children from wrongdoing by teaching them that "honesty is the best policy," and by instilling similar worldly maxims, they are using means which, like the guy ropes, may fail in some stress of temptation and produce the evil they were set to prevent. (1 Timothy 6 : 5.)

Unattainable Wealth.

A discovery of a peculiar tantalizing character was made recently in Dubuque County, Iowa. On a farm there, is a curious lake that extends for some distance under the side of a hill. It has been found by exploration that the subterranean part of it is larger than that which is exposed. Recently, in making some improvements it became necessary to sink a shaft to the bed of the lake. To the surprise of the workmen they struck pure lead crystals. The farm is in the heart of the lead region, but until now none of the metal had been found there. An effort was at once made to secure the treasure and work the veins in the bed of the lake. It was at first supposed that it would be a simple thing to drain the lake, or to pump it dry. Arrangements were made to carry out the work, but after proceeding with the operation for some time, there was no diminution of the quanity of water. It is now found that the lake has a connection underground with the Mississippi River and the futility of draining it or pumping it is apparent. The farmer is consulting with prominent engineers, who may eventually, be able to help him, but at present he is in the tantalizing position of possessing wealth which he cannot reach or use in any way. There are some Christians who, all their life long find wealth similarly just beyond their grasp, and are foiled in every attempt to gain it. Perhaps, in the clearer light of the eternal world, they will see that what interposed between them and fortune was the inexhaustible ocean of God's love wich prevented their having the thing that would have injured their better life. (Hosea 13 : 6.)

Between Fire and Flood.

The crew of a steamer which put into Halifax, N. S., on February 9, had a thrilling experience. The steamer was on its way from Galveston, Tex. to Hamburg, laden with logs of cedar, a large quantity of oil-cake and thirty-five hundred bales of cotton. They encountered the terrific storm when they were five hundred miles off Halifax. The first serious trouble arose from the breaking loose of the cedar logs which were piled on deck. With every lurch of the ship they rolled about smashing everything in their way. Several of the crew were hurt and it was decided for the sake of safety to expedite the rolling of the logs overboard. While the crew were busy at this work, they were surprised to notice the deck growing hot beneath their feet. There could be only one cause in this wintry weather for such a circumstance. The cargo of cotton must be on fire. A search was made and the terrible fact was established. The position of the crew may be imagined. The storm was at its height, gigantic waves breaking over the ship and threatening to engulf her, the great cedar logs pitching around, and the smoke of the burning cotton bursting from every crevice. The captain determined to make a quick run for Halifax, but it seemed doubtful whether it would be possible to fight the fire and navigate the ship even to that port. The crew would have abandoned the vessel had there been the slightest chance of a boat living in such a sea. Happily the sea aided them by drenching the decks every few minutes and finally the port of Halifax was reached safely. Thus many a soul has entered the haven of eternal rest after an analogous experience. With the fires of appetite and passion within him, kept in subjection, and the storms of trial and trouble around him, he has feared that he would be lost, but has been delivered through the grace of God. (II Cor. 7 : 5.)

THE ROYAL PALACE AT HONOLULU WHERE THE QUEEN SIGNED HER ABDICATION.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr Cantine the Agent of the American Bible Society in Arabia, writes that several [illegible] districts of that ancient country are now accessible to Bible colporteurs.

Evangelist John T. Vine Has Been Holding successful revival services in the Central Methodist Church, At Cairo and East Durham there were large accessions to the churches, as the result of God's blessing on the services.

Bishop Tucker, who Now Has Charge Over the Diocese in Africa, of which the martyred Hannington was bishop, has been stricken down with the African fever. When the last mail left he was in the hospital at Mombasa.

Mr. D. L. Moody and Mr. Ira D Sankey have promised to visit Mexico at the conclusion of their work in Texas, and will hold services in the capital. Our readers are asked to pray that God will bless the effort in that land, which is to so large an extent a stranger to the Gospel.

Union Evangelistic Services have been Held in Greenpoint, L. I., for several weeks. The pastors of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, Rev. J. J. Dunlop and Rev. H. H. Beatty and Rev. J. F. Carson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, have taken charge in turn.

A Copy of the First Bible Ever Printed in America [illegible] It was printed in Boston in 1761, by Samuel Kneeland. As it was against the law at that time for anyone to print a Bible without the permission of the king, the printer modestly suppressed his own name and fraudulently placed that of Mark Baskett, the king's authorized printer in London, on the title page as the printer

Rev S. M. Zwemer has been Doing very successful missionary work in Arabia. He is a Holland-American by birth and he has gone out as a missionary under the auspices of the Reformed Dutch Church, which was the first American church to send missionaries to Arabia Mr. Zwemer was educated at New Brunswick, N. J., and regularly ordained. He is not of Jewish birth as was erroneously stated.

The Death of Rev. Dr. William M. Taylor, formerly pastor of Broadway Tabernacle, New York brings sorrow to many homes. Dr. Taylor was admired and loved wherever he was known. Although, after the stroke of paralysis, which caused his resignation [illegible] three years ago, no hope of resuming active work was entertained, it was hoped that his life might be prolonged and he might preach to his people occasionally. He died on Feb. 8th.

Evangelists Billing and Byers have been conducting evangelistic meetings at various points in Nebraska. There have been many conversions. The terrible distress in the State appears to have been instrumental in turning the thoughts of many to spiritual matters. The relief sent from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other religious sources has, it is believed, also tended to remove prejudice against religion that existed in many circles.

The Christian Endeavor Society connected with the Clarendon Baptist Church, Boston, of which the late Dr. A. J. Gordon was pastor, has entered on a work of love. At the first meeting of the Society after their beloved pastor's death, the young people resolved to raise a memorial to him and $425 was immediately contributed. On a discussion of the form the memorial should take, it was unanimously decided to apply it to the reduction of the debt on the American Baptist Missionary Union, in which Dr. Gordon was deeply interested.

Rev. Thomas Harrison's Jubilee Service at Bridgeton, N. J., on Feb. 5, was an event which will not soon be forgotten there. Large numbers of thrilling testimonies were given by persons, who have made profession of conversion during the meetings. The number of converts is stated to be three hundred and forty. Dr. Vernon of Indianapolis, who was present at the Jubilee, said that after Mr. Harrison's services in that city four hundred and fifty persons were received into his church on probation, of whom at the end of six months, all but nine were received into full membership.

King Khama, the Christian King of Bhamangwato, South Central Africa, recently had an interview with Sir Henry Loch, the British Governor of Cape Colony, in which he described his efforts to prevent his people being demoralized by liquor. The Governor having reported the interview to England, has now received a telegram direct from Quen Victoria for transmission to King Khama, assuring him that she heartily sympathizes with his effort and that she will co-operate with him to the full extent of her powers in preventing the importation of liquor into his dominions.

A Boston Journal Says that the Death of Rev. A. J. Gordon has revealed for the first time the extent of his labors. No one knew how many of the poor families in that city were visited and helped by him until the news of his death was published. The testimonies of hundreds of persons show that Dr. Gordon did an extensive [illegible] philanthropic work of which no one knew anything. Not even his own family knew that when he was absent from home for many hours at a time he was visiting the homes of the poor and afflicted in the lowest quarters of the city. How he found time for this visiting in addition to his pulpit and literary labors is a mystery.

SERMONS-WORTH READING

HELPFUL DISCOURSES for the PEOPLE

THE CHRISTIAN'S WEALTH.

One of the Last Sermons Dr. A. J. Gordon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., and Prepared for Publication in "The Christian Herald." Text: I. Cor. 3: 21-23. "For all things are yours: whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas or the world or life or death or things present or things to come: all are yours, and ye are Christ's and Christ is God's."

WE have in this text a very plain and practical lesson in joint heirship. We remember this saying in the eighth of Romans: "If children then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." And here we have an inventory of our estate, a summary of our inheritance, a list of the spiritual goods that belong to us. It will be our task, at this time, to set before you a description of your property.

All Teachers

of truth are ours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas. Referring back to the opening of the chapter, we see that Paul had complained of the sectarian spirit of the sectarian spirit of the brethren. One said, "I am of Paul," and another said, "I am of Apollos," and so divisions and factions were created in the church. Is not this a constant temptation? We identify the truth with the men who report it to us, and so call ourselves Calvinists or Lutherans or Wesleyans. These men preach the truth, but not one of them ever said as Jesus Christ said: "I am the Truth;" these men communicated spiritual light to the church, but not one of them ever said as Christ did: "I am the light of the world." There are many planets, but one sun and each planet shines only by the reflected light of the sun: and so as the disciples of Christ we are bound to be one, however we differ. Perhaps the hostile sects of the East—the sun-worshippers and fire-worshippers and the followers of the crescent—might like to carve up the sun or moon and divide it among themselves. But that is just the thing they cannot do, however much they hate to have anything in common. The fire-worshipper may kindle the flame which he keeps perpetually burning; the moon-devotee may glory in the pale light of the crescent; but both must own that all their light and all their fire come from one sun. "Now this I say," writes the apostle, (I. Cor. 1-12) "that every one of you saith, 'I am of Paul and I am of Apollos and I of Cephas and I of Christ.' Is Christ divided?" No, not any more than the sun is sliced to pieces when it shines in the four corners of the heavens. Paul and Cephas and Apollos and James and Augustine and Calvin and Luther and Wesley and Chalmers and Spurgeon—all these reflected the clear rays from the Sun of Righteousness. If therefore Christ is ours, they are ours. The light which they communicated is our light. The knowledge of the Gospel which they acquired is our knowledge, and we cannot afford to ignore any of them in summing up our spiritual wealth.

How inveterate is the temptation to monopolise the truth, and to set up to some special truth, or to the great men who have taught us some special truth! There is baptism—the symbolic burial and resurrection of the believer with Christ—what a deep, comprehensive and graphic symbol it is. "But it is ours," says the Baptist. "It is copyrighted, and our church holds the patent right to it. Join us and you may have a share of it, but not otherwise." So some have spoken, as though we could be monopolists of truth; as though we could create an ecclesiastical trust for holding precious doctrines in our own hands. And there is the doctrine of sanctification and the witness of the Spirit—"These are ours," says the Methodist—bequeathed to us by Wesley and Fletcher and Whitefield. You cannot get the genuine article except you come inside our ranks." It is exactly this spirit that the Apostle is condemning in our text. Truth is a common property belonging to the whole church of God; and the teachers who have unfolded the truth are the common inheritance of the great body of believers. Tell me what you know of the globe upon which we live? You possibly have never been out of the United States, and yet you know about Europe and Asia and Japan and the islands of the Sea. And how do you know? Because all the great explorers are yours and all the wealth of discovery which they have brought—Franklin and Kane from the ice-bound regions of the North—Livingstone and Stanley from the torrid plains of Africa, Cook and Drake from the Islands of the Sea. It is their discoveries which have given us a map of the world. All these are ours. And so in the church of modern times, to go no further back. The spiritual illumination of George Fox, the Quaker—the profound reasoning of Jonathan Edwards, the Puritan, the evangelical fervor of John Wesley, the Methodist, the rich Gospel simplicity of Charles Spurgeon, the Baptist—all this has been weaving into the warp and woof of our latter day evangelical faith. Indeed, this is according to God's way of working. Paul praying in the Holy Ghost "that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge." To comprehend with all saints! Truth is a globe which no single explorer has ever yet circumnavigated. It is only by the combined knowledge of those living on all sides of it that we begin to comprehend that which passeth knowledge. Claim therefore your inheritance, O Christian! All saints are yours; all teachers are your teachers; all truths as set forth by all preachers are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

An Exclusive Claim

The World is ours:

"Whether Paul or Apollos or the world—I take this word in its largest sense—the material universe. I do not think we have half appreciated this portion of our inheritance in Christ; and I would advise you to go out under the clear, starry heavens some cloudless night and count up your wealth. "Whether Paul or Apollos or the world." When you become disheartened from looking around, look up and get relief and cheer. You know the famous saying of St. Cuthbert. When overtaken in a terrific storm his comrades said to him, "The sea is before us, and our pathway is blocked with snow behind us—what shall we do?" The heroic saint replied: "Thank God the road to heaven is unobstructed." And so if ever you despair when looking at the earth — volcanoes wiping out whole cities; floods bearing thousands of helpless beings into sudden ruin: tornadoes driving a whole village to wreck in less time than you can crush a dry leaf in your hand; fire consuming twenty prosperous and peaceful hamlets in a day; riots, strikes, wars and rumors of wars, the dagger at the king's heart and dynamite under the king's throne—enough to make one swoon with heartsickness when one stops to take it all in Why then look up and say with the Psalmist: "When I consider the heavens the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him?" This earth is only a pebble on the shore of the infinite universe: a grain of sand on the boundless beach of the ocean of space. If by wreck or revolution or the fires of judgment I should lose this earth, the stars are mine, planet upon planet, system upon system. "Let not your heart be troubled," says Jesus, "In my Father's house are many mansions. . . I go to prepare a place for you." Perhaps as you look up to the heavens in the evening you can see the mansion where your beloved ones are now dwelling and you may have a room already fitted up for your residence hereafter. I do not think such a conjecture at all improbable. God and Christ and the angels do not live in an infinite and boundless nowhere. "I go to prepare a place for you," says Jesus, and place has location and bounds and reality. It is somewhere and it may be in one of the myriad stars which you see at night. Why should it seem incredible?

And who made all those shining worlds? Listen: "All things were made by him and without him was not anything made which was made." If he made them he owns them; and if he owns them, we own them, for "all things are yours and ye are Christ's and Christ is God's." Here, my brethren, is the title deed to

Your Real Estate.

But the earth itself is ours if we are Christ's. "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." This promise unquestionably refers to the present material globe. The Scriptures teach plainly that it is to be renovated by fire and overarched with a new heaven and that then it will become the millennial abode of the saints. Not simply does Christ remove the stain from human consciences the death curse from human bodies, but the dragon curse from our groaning and suffering earth. His work will not be completed till he has wiped away every trace and taint of sin from the earth and turned a Paradise lost into a Paradise regained, replaced the groans of creation with the music of redemption.

Life and Death

are ours. That is, life is ours, because death is ours, having been conquered by Christ and compelled to yield up its prey. Here you see at once the distinction between the regenerate and unregenerate condition. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." You cast a handful of grain into the earth and you discover that ninety seeds out of the hundred spring up and bear fruit, and ten remain in the earth and rot there. If you ask the reason why, it may appear that ten of the seeds have been sterilised by frost or by heat and that their life principle has been destroyed. We shall all go into the grave if the Lord tarry, but all will not spring up at the coming of Christ in glory to raise the dead. They that have Christ have life—that life which is the principle of the resurrection, and they that have not Christ have not life. In a word, our share in the first resurrection is dependent entirely on our being in Christ and having Christ in us. Hear how our Lord affirms and reiterates this fact in the sixth of John: "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him should have eternal life and I will raise him up at the last day." Faith in Christ, the condition of partnership in the first resurrection! "No man can come to me except the Father which sent me draw him; and I will raise him at the last day." Only as we come to Christ now, can we come with Christ in the first resurrection. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Communion with Christ now is the condition of resurrection with Christ at his coming. Thus, as this refrain, "I will raise him up at the last day" sounds in our ears again and again and again, it reiterates the same lesson—No life out of Christ and no resurrection into life for those who live and die unregenerate.

Life by Union.

Yes, this is it. Life is yours and ye are Christ's. As the sap in the tree enters into the scion, when, by grafting, that scion has been incorporated with the tree, so this life of Christ becomes ours when by faith we have been united to him. "He that hath the Son hath life." This fact lies at the foundation of every privilege and possession which the Gospel holds out to us. "To him that hath shall be given," says Jesus, "and he that believeth on the Son hath life." Therefore to him can be given. Growth is only possible to him if he has life. The tiniest seed has the advantage over a block of marble, though the marble were the finest ever cut from the quarries of Vermont. The seed can grow, the marble cannot.

Fruitfulness is possible to him only who has life. The commonest apple tree in your garden has precedence over the most majestic pillar in a European cathedral. It can bud with every returning Spring: it can fashion its fruit with all the exquisite grace of tint and color and shape; it can ripen that fruit and cast it into the lap of the husbandman with each returning autumn. Wonderful significance is there in this saying: "Life is yours." All of joy, of strength, of fruitfulness, and final conquest are wrapped up for us in these words. And when death comes, if it shall come, we may hear with our last final gasp, the words of the strong Son of God: "And up at the last day." Here is the crown and consummation of life; and considering its greatness and importance, what wonder that all the powers of darkness were brought to bear to prevent our Lord's rising from the grave; and to prevent the world from believing in the fact after he was raised. John Bunyan, with his wonderful gift at personification, names death and dissolution, "The terrible Captain Sepulchre and his standard bearer Corruption." I think I hear these two talking together on the night when Christ was buried. "Hold fast to that man in Joseph's tomb," says Corruption to Sepulchre, "hold him fast till I can fasten on him with my teeth." But though death holds him fast through Friday night and Saturday, Corruption can get no hold on him; for it had been declared by David, speaking by the Holy Ghost: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Hell from beneath was moved with affright and cried out to the sepulchre, "Hold fast to that man in Joseph's tomb; if thou let this man go thou art not Satan's friend." And he that hath the power of death, that is the devil, lifts up his voice from the pit, "Oh grave, hold fast thy prisoner: if he gets out he will make a breach in the wall through which all the rest will come forth." But vain the watch, and vain the seal, and vain the resistance of the powers of darkness. "It was not possible that he should be holden of death." After the two appointed days were over he came forth from the tomb. And what did he bring in his hands? "Life and immortality." To every true believer he now says: "Life is yours." Death may strike you down and hold you for a little while in his grip, but I will raise you up at the last day. And I will raise you up in no mortal, corruptible body, but in a body fashioned like unto my own,—immortal, forever beyond the power of sin and sickness and decay. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection, for upon such the second death has no power."

And things present and

are ours. I thank God that I am not to have all my good things in this life, for then I should have nothing to anticipate in glory; and I thank God I am not to have all my good things in the life to come, for then I should have nothing to enjoy in the present world. No, the Gospel in a wise and right sense is that which enables us "to make the most of both worlds." You remember how distinctly the Lord puts his promise: "Manifold more in the present time and in the age to come, life everlasting" (Luke 18-29). But this manifold more in the present time is conditioned on our willingness to forsake houses and lands and kindred for Christ's sake. Christ has nothing in his hand for those who are so greedy of gold or so hungry for pleasure that they devote their whole life to the business of getting and keeping. The Lord gives in this life, but it is to those who give up. The Lord multiplies his blessings even in this present world, but it is to those who minimize their pleasures for his sake. The Word standeth fast for those who are ready to meet the conditions "manifold more in the present time." Who in the world knows such joys as the Christian — the joy of doing good in Christ's name; the joy of bearing another's burdens, and so fulfilling the law of Christ; the joy of suffering for Christ with the sweet inward satisfaction resulting therefrom? Uninterrupted pleasure becomes monotonous, and the music of life that has no minor strain in it, becomes tedious. Therefore, our Lord links our happiness in this world with self-sacrifice for him. He tells us that if we will choose his cross we shall have his joy. And in the world to come life eternal. Here we have Christ's life in us; there we shall be in his life. "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of the Lord." "It is but a little joy that can enter into us here, because of our narrow capacity; but there we shall enter into joy as vessels put into a sea of happiness."

C Subscriber. 1. Is it wrong to practice music lessons on the Sabbath day? 2. Have you small Testaments? If so, kindly send me the price.

Yes; it is just as much a violation of the sanctity of the day to devote its hours to mere music practice as it would be to spend them in ball-playing or carriage-driving. This does not apply to the rendering of songs of praise in public worship or in the home. 2 No, write the American Bible Society New York.

R. S., Caldwell, O. Who are the "children of the kingdom" referred to in Matthew 8: 12?

Persons who have special religious privileges. Christ was comparing the conduct of the Roman Centurion with that of the unbelieving Jews. The Jews had the idea that their being descendants of Abraham gave them birthright in the kingdom of heaven. Jesus told them that some of the people whom they despised as heathen would be received, while they would be excluded

R. P., Newton, Ia. Do you think a true, sincere and conscientious Roman Catholic may find everlasting life?

Any man who believes in Christ, as his Saviour, and has committed his soul to him according to the Gospel, and is living a life of faith and holiness, will, we believe, be saved, whatever Christian Church he may belong to. We are, however, unable to see how such a person can remain in the Roman Catholic Church, worship the Virgin and accept certain doctrines which his church requires him to hold.

T. S., Beverly, Mass. Can you explain why the beetle of Egypt, with which the Jews were familiar, was an emblem of Eternity and Resurrection, and why it was worshipped?

The scarabœus was worshipped because of its supposed mystical virtues. The number of its toes (30) represented the days of the month; its time of depositing eggs had reference to the lunar month, and another of its peculiarities had reference to the action of the sun on the earth. As it was of one sex (as supposed) it represented the eternal, self-existent, self-begotten principle of deity, and there were still other parallels which the Egyptians discovered to connect the sacred beetle with their gods. During its life it was worshipped, and after death embalmed.

W. Vilas, Collinsville, Ill. Does the Holy Spirit come upon every believer in the present day as he came upon the Apostles at the day of Pentecost?

Not in results. Every believer receives the Holy Spirit, but not its miraculous powers. Even in Apostolic days there was a difference in the gifts conferred. (See I. Cor. 12: 1–12.) Paul says, "there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit." As at Pentecost, the Holy Spirit fits men with the particular gift required for the work they are to do. In our day, some men have eloquence, others logical acumen, and others other gifts. There was a special need at the Pentecost of the gift of tongues, as the uneducated men had to preach to foreigners, and the Holy Spirit gave that, as he might give it again if it were needed.

Constant Reader, Storrs, Conn. There appears to be some contradiction between Job 19: 26 and 1 Cor. 15: 50. In the former Job says, "In my flesh I shall see God," and in the latter Paul says, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." Please explain.

The passage in Job is a mistranslation. It is given correctly in the Revised Version as "From (or without) my flesh I shall see God." The patriarch's meaning appears to be that, although he may die under his sufferings, that will not be the end. He will still live and God will vindicate him. The Apostle writing to people disposed to materialism, argues that the body is merely a dwelling inhabited by the real man who can live without it, and he goes on to say that even those who will be alive when Christ comes, will not have the body they previously had, but will be changed at his coming. The gross and the material have no place in the heavenly state.

W. A. C., Berry, Ga. 1. Why, if Easter is the anniversary of our Lord's resurrection, does it occur on different dates in different years? 2. Is it wrong to encourage a child's belief in Santa Claus?

1. The early Christians naturally associated the Passion and resurrection of Christ with the Passover and the celebration of the anniversary followed that feast. As the date of the Passover was at the first full moon after the spring equinox the celebration of Easter was held at the same time. Easter, however, is a misnomer as applied to the anniversary. The word is derived from the name of a Saxon goddess Estera, whose festival occurred at the same time as the Jewish Passover. It gave its name to the occasion, and the Anglo-Saxon Christians retained the name, although the event celebrated was so different. 2. As soon as the child can comprehend your meaning you should explain that the beautiful story of Santa Claus, which affords so much pleasure to childhood in many lands, is only a Christmas myth, typifying the generous Giver of all good things, who at that hallowed season bestowed on his children on earth the priceless gift of his own Son.

THE MILLENNIAL PRIEST.

The Relation of Melchisedec to the Rule of Christ in the Millennium.

BY REV. WM. MAUDE

UNDER what aspect does our Lord's priesthood more particularly correspond to the priesthood of Melchisedec? In other words, Was Christ made a priest "after the order (i.e. 'similitude') of Melchisedec" at his first advent, when he appeared to offer the one great sacrifice for sin, for ever; or, will he be so constituted, at his second advent, when, during his millennial reign, the regal office, heretofore as it were in abeyance, shall be exercised in conjunction with the priestly? In one sense it must, I think, be admitted that this Melchisedec priesthood of Christ dates from his ascension, and is now possessed by him in the heavens; still, it will not, I apprehend, be exercised by him till after he appears the second time, "without a sin-offering," like the Jewish high priest when he came forth from the most holy place, having presented the blood before the throne, to bless the people. The grounds upon which this conclusion is based are the following:

1. It seems to be indicated, not obscurely in the very language alike of the Apostle and the Psalmist, when literally translated. "Thou art a priest for the age after the order of Melchisedec." (Heb. 7: 21). So I would render a sentence very important and full of meaning which the Apostle quotes no less than five times, making it the basis of his lengthy argument. And the language of the 110th Psalm exactly corresponds in the Hebrew, for the learned Bennet thus renders the fourth verse: "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a priest for the future age, according to my appointment, O King of Righteousness." But in the first three verses of this Psalm we have a description of the assumption of Christ's future kingly rule, and the question, therefore, is naturally suggested, Will not Christ, when he thus assumes the kingly, lay aside his present priestly office? No; the Psalmist seems to say, for "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a priest (also) for the future age," i. e., the Millennial age, of the introduction of which this whole Psalm treats.

But of what character is his priesthood? "After the order of Melchisedec:" in other words, as we shall immediately see, a priesthood exercised in conjunction with kingship. I conclude, therefore, that the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ is his Millennial priesthood, in contradistinction to that which he is at present exercising, which is rather the antitype of the priesthood of Aaron.

2. Again: the Millennial character of the priesthood of Melchisedec is, it seems to me, indicated by the fact that it was after the slaughter of the Canaanitish kings that Abraham was met and blessed by Melchisedec. Now this slaughter of the four kings is evidently typical of the last great conflict, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, of which Zechariah speaks, where he says: "I will gather all the nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished; and half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city. Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle," etc. (Zech. 14: 2-5).

3. But most especially and unmistakably is the Millennial character of the Melchisedec priesthood proved by the fact that it is a regal priesthood. It is written, as we have seen, concerning Melchisedec, not only that he was "first (by interpretation of his name), King of Righteousness, and after that King of Salem, which is, King of Peace; but also, that he was at the same time "the priest of the most high God." Now all this is luminously descriptive of the King Messiah. For these three titles—"King of Righteousness," by interpretation of the name Melchisedec: "King of Salem," afterwards Jerusalem (Ps. 76: 2; Gen. 14: 18); and "King of Peace," are not titles appertaining to Christ's kingdom in the heavens, but to the future kingdom of Messiah on earth as foretold by the prophets. Christ will be "King of Righteousness" in those yet future days of which the Lord speaks, by Jeremiah: "Behold, the day is come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justce in the earth.

THE LIFE-GIVER.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Mar. 3. Rev. 3: 1-31, 7-13, 20-22.

FROM the idea of Christ as a mere philosopher and teacher the Church turns with indignant protest. He was all that, but if he had been only that, the Church would not have been what it is today. He was and is a life-giver. The man who knows the truth, who knows how he ought to live, but who cannot live as he would, goes to Christ and finds new life in his veins. The man who makes good resolutions and with all the force in his nature tries to keep them, but miserably fails, finds when he comes in contact with Christ a power not his own, working in him for righteousness. The man sunk in vice and sensuality, so low down in degradation that he has abandoned all hope of shaking off his bonds and developing from the beast to the man, discovers when he puts faith in Christ that there is a new force imparted to him, which is more wonderful than any miracle on record. We cannot explain it, but the fact is incontrovertible. There are men now living in every city, who have felt the power and whose changed lives are evidence of its potency. Virtue goes out of Christ now as it went out of him when the woman touched his garment and it heals and saves as it did then. I am the resurrection and the life, he said to Martha as he stood by the grave of Lazarus and he makes the same claim now. And men find it true. When all that is noble, all that is pure, almost all that is human is dead within them, Christ brings them to resurrection, to a new life and a new being. They hear the voice of Christ summoning the better nature in them as he summoned the man in the charnel-house, Lazarus come forth. And he gives the power to obey. To the man who will receive it he gives it freely and delights to give it. There are some so vile and corrupt that the people have felt about them as Martha did at the door of the tomb; but even on them the power of Christ is transforming. The new life he gives shakes off corruption. It is time we got rid of the idea of God as an autocrat ruling the world at a distance, making laws, capriciously meting out punishments. The true conception of him is as we see him in Christ, infinitely pitiful, kind and sympathetic, ready to help all who are willing to be helped. Sin is loss and injury by inevitable law and God would have us leave it for our own good. As we grieve to see a young man of talent and genial nature giving himself to drunkenness and licentiousness, as we expostulate with him and beg him not to throw his life away, so God looks on every sinful man. In his helplessness he cannot deliver himself, but he can have help. Though his lower nature has so asserted its power that he has lost all sign of spiritual life, though he has sunk below the level of the beast, God gives the power to live and move and grow into his image. This is the glory of Christianity; it is less theology than life.

THE METROPOLITAN Y. M. C. A.

A notable celebration took place recently in the Young Men's Christian Association building on Twenty-third Street, New York. It was the forty-second anniversary of the organization of the Association in the city and the seventh anniversary of the Twenty-third Street branch. A large number of distinguished men were present to offer congratulations and the official reports showed that there was a sound basis for them. Mr R. R. McBurney, the general secretary, whose portrait with a picture of the Central building appears on this page, was able to show a most gratifying condition of affairs There are now, it appears, 7,582 members connected with the various branches, while the aggregate attendance during the past year had been 1,851,347. The various educational classes had an enrollment of 4608. The Association is about to open a new branch on the west-side at Fifty-sixth Street near Eighth Ave. All the existing branches are doing excellent work and are increasing steadily in numbers and popularity. Mr. McBurney had the pleasure of announcing the receipt of a handsome gift to the Association from a donor whose name was not disclosed. He had given the Association in fee simple a fine office building on Broadway, the value of which is $200,000. The building will make an important addition to the income of the Association from the rents of its offices. It is understood that the donor's object was to encourage the Association to open new branches and especially to proceed with the erection of the west-side branch, the site of which was a gift from the late Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt.

A CHINESE C. E. MEETING.

From the pen of Dr. Mary Gale comes the following description of a Christian Endeavor meeting in China, which is published in "The Missionary Link:" Last spring there was a very wonderful meeting in Shanghai. Probably five hundred people were gathered in the Methodist Church, the largest building we have for native meetings. This was the first annual meeting of the Christian Endeavor societies of Shanghai, native and foreign which have a membership of one thousand. I hoped we should find a little gathering of young people, but when I entered the church and saw the numbers already seated, I was amazed. The speeches and all the exercises in fact were in Chinese, except a word of greeting from the foreign societies to the native, and that was translated, and one hymn sung by the foreign juniors. There were two set speeches by young preachers, explaining the aims and methods of Christian Endeavor societies; a dialogue between two teachers, I think, assisted by a small boy of ten or eleven. This little fellow was the most unembarrassed of public speakers, and his voice was clearly heard above the din of the crowd. There were songs by schoolboys, and two short addresses by young men of sixteen or seventeen years of age. No one failed, though these last were never so frightened in their lives, I fancy. The gem for us foreigners was the song by the foreign children, "Jesus Bids Us Shine," when the girls' voices harmonized with the boys' so sweetly that the Chinese themselves were moved. I have never seen our Hospital helpers so pleased over any religious service. It was a novel thing for them to see young people take part in a meeting, and I think the enthusiasm of the Y. P. S. C. E. communicated itself to them. We hope some day to have a society in our own mission, but as yet there are obstacles which cannot be overcome. Our members are young girls, who cannot, as a rule, go out to meetings. They must be guarded from the speech of people, and bide their time in patience, for their emancipation from the fetters which ignorance and heathen customs have imposed upon them. You who are Christian Endeavorers should remember these young societies of Chinese boys and girls in love and prayer. They are waking to new life and opportunities, and they will have new temptations and trials.

KING'S DAGHTERS IN VIRGINIA.

From the semi-annual report of the King's Daughters of Virginia forwarded to headquarters, and published in the journal of the order, we extract the following items, which show the character of the work being done by the Christlike organization:

At Onancook there is a circle, of which the secretary, Elizabeth W. Quinby, writes: "We are striving to keep our own hearts pure and to live as becomes true daughters of our King. We have given away clothing and provisions to needy ones here at home, sent clothes to a mission school in Africa, and bed linen to a retreat for the sick. We have also bought shoes, clothing, and a trunk to help a young girl remain at school, besides doing sewing for her."—— Another circle in Richmond, which has taken the appropriate name of "The Sunshine Band," has paid rent, furnished fuel, and helped to clothe several poor families; contributed to the Day Nursery, and Kindergarten, the Ice Mission, the Old Market Mission, and the Virginia Medical Hospital, and sent a donation to a poor minister who needed temporary help.——"The Faithful Circle," also in Richmond, of which Miss Lillian Yarborough is leader, paid regular visits to the "Retreat for the Sick," the patients read to, and flowers, useful articles, and delicacies carried to them. A poor girl at St. Luke's was visited, clothed, and sent back to her home when she recovered. Visits were made among the poor, and food and clothing distributed. The Kindergarten and the Old Ladies' Home have also been visited, and a regular contribution given for the support of a girl at the Sheltering Arms.——At Bessemer is a Patience Circle, the secretary of which, Mary Carter, writes: "Most of our members are school girls. Having no house of worship in our small but beautiful mountain village, we are trying to build a chapel and library, to be used for a school-room, and by all denominations. We have had contributions of books, money, etc., and all such aid will be very acceptable. In working for this great need, we try not to forget to "lend a hand," and we have ministers to the sick, needy and troubled. This summer we have cared for one of our members in illness and helped a poor family whose home was burned."—— "The Whatsoever Circle," in Marion, works exclusively among the inmates of the S. W. Hospital for the Insane, and has been blessed in its efforts to shed brightness into the lives of the afflicted patients. This Circle is composed of members of the officers' families and attendants at the institution. The patients are given treats, the sick visited and furnished such extras as the physicians allow. Literature, papers and pictures have been distributed.

These are but a few of many similar records of work done for the poor and the afflicted by the devoted Daughters of the King in the name of Christ.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

There are four Epworth Leagues, with about one hundred members, in the Hyderabad district, India. One of these is composed of Canarese.

The Epworth League at Sioux City, Ia has been greatly blessed during the wonderful revival. It has a membership now of one hundred and forty.

A Baptist Young People's Union in Iowa had the happiness of seeing five of its associate members pass by baptism into the active list during the month of January.

The Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association in the ancient city of Damascus, has decided to erect a small building of its own for the work. The present quarters are now too small for the membership.

The Illinois Christian Endeavor Union has organized a Correspondence Committee, through the medium of which young people removing to any town in Illinois will receive a cordial welcome to their new home.

At a Conference of Christians of all denominations held recently in Rome, it was decided to organize a Young Men's Christian Association as the best method of united effort for the benefit of the young men of the city.

The German Epworth League has sustained a heavy loss in the death of Henry Liebhart, of Cincinnati, the editor of "Haus und Herd," who was accidentally killed while on a railroad journey at New Haven, Mich. He was an enthusiastic and untiring League leader.

The B. Y. P. U. of the Bloomfield ( ) Association will hold a two day's Convention at Tuscola, Feb. 21 and 22. Among the speakers are to be Rev. J. B. Topel Mansfield; Rev. G. E. Nicholson of Fairmount; Rev. W. R. Andereck of Danville; Dr. N. H. Steadman, of Champaign, and the General Secretary of the B. Y. P. U.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Portland arranged to have two of their members at each door of the hall in which Col. Ingersoll lectured recently. As the audience filed out after the lecture, each person received from the Christian Endeavorers a copy of a tract, setting forth the reasons for holding the Bible to be true.

The arrangements for the great Christian Endeavor Convention in Boston are being rapidly pushed forward. Mechanics' Hall has been secured for the meetings. The main portion will be used for an auditorium and the other two parts respectively for Massachusetts Headquarters and a restaurant. Two huge tents capable of covering ten thousand persons each have also been leased. Several large churches have also been placed at the disposal of the committee. In all, there will be no embarrassment as 36,000 delegates were to attend the Convention. Any inquiries should be addressed to Mr. R. H. Magwood, 646 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Winter Days in Japan.

ow the Merry People of the Mikado's Realm Pass the Winter Season—Social Life in the Gay City of Tokio.

TOKIO, the capital of Japan, and the very heart and life of the "Empire of the Rising Sun," presents a gay scene in winter. It is a city covering twenty-eight square miles, and is full of animation, bustle id trade. Its many fine buildings, schools id colleges, give it, in some quarters, an most European aspect, and its population as busy, energetic and pleasure-loving s that of any capital on the face of the obe.

January and February are cold but clear onths in Tokio. There is usually only a ight snowfall, and it does not remain ng, being melted by the winds which are ternately as balmy as those of May and s bleak as our own proverbial March ales. A few days of lovely weather are ot to be followed by a keen northerly ind that freezes the ponds, canals, rivers id lakes, and captures the city suddenly its icy grasp. Aged and sickly people id the very young are glad to stay inoors in such trying weather, but the snow rnishes an opportunity for fine sport to ultitudes. How the Japanese, in their ail and unsubstantial native houses, conive to keep warm in such weather is a ystery to most travelers who happen to isit Tokio in the cold season. With the ch, however, it is altogether different. Vrapped in heavy woolen coatings and rs, they brave the wind and snow and pin merrily across the ponds and lakes to ie music of sleigh-bells. Even in winter ostume, the graceful bamboo parasol is an separable portion of a lady's outdoor quipment, as our photograph shows. Japnese women have a taste in dress that is lecidedly picturesque and becoming, and he native graces, even of the school-girls f Tokio, would inspire the pencil of an rtist.

March is a changeable month in Japan nd people do not leave off their thick vraps and overcoats or reduce their fires ntil the flowers begin to peep through the ground about the middle of April, when the beautiful groves of cherry trees in Uyeno and Asakusa, near Tokio, put on their dress of pink-and-white blossoms. May is a delightful month; a trifle cool, evenings, but full of hints of the rapidly coming summer. June is misty and rainy, but in July and August the weather is usually clear and fiercely hot at times, and this heat lasts until the sea winds of September come to moderate it. The three last months of the year are ordinarily pleasant, and fires begin to be appreciated before the end of October. On the whole, the climate is temperate and healthful. Grass remains green the year round and even in winter the camelias, are abloom.

Tokio is, for an Asiatic capital, quite cosmopolitan. All nationalities are to be found there, the European and American portion of society being composed of officials, merchants and their employees, missionaries, professors and tourists. The fragile and almost toy-like native houses are the despair of foreigners who attempt to live in them. Yet there are many compensations for the discomforts that must be borne. The Japanese are an exceedingly social people and their hospitality is boundless, so that, no matter what the season of the year, the well-behaved stranger within their gates is sure of welcome and entertainment.

A Little Queen Rebuffed.

A pretty little story about young Queen Wilhelmina of Holland, appears in the journals of the Hague. The Queen is at present only fourteen years of age, and she is credited with even a larger measure of caprice and precocity than is usually granted to less exalted young ladies at that interesting period of life. Her mother, the Queen Regent, therefore thinks it well at times to deal somewhat severely with Wilhelmina's little ways. Lately the young Queen, desiring to speak to her mother, knocked—not perhaps, in the most dignified fashion—at the door of the room in which the Queen Regent was engaged. "Who is there?" "It is the Queen of Holland!" (imperiously.) "Then she must not enter!" (peremptorily.) At this rebuff the little Queen suddenly changed her tactics, and softening her tones, said winningly, "Mamma, it is your own little daughter that loves you, and would like to kiss you." "You may come in." And the young sovereign who could not enter as Queen, won her way, as a loving and dutiful daughter, to her mother's heart.

Girls on the Farm.

Books alone are not enough to fill the lives of girls on the farm with interest and pleasure. They should have a variety of simple amusements, chief of which should be their association with those of their own and of the opposite sex. The girls ought to have evenings when they can entertain their friends with games, with pleasant conversation, and a little feast of fruit or nuts and home-made dainties. Young people need young society. Young girls are all the brighter and better and happier for sensible friendships with young folks. The summer should bring the farmer's daughter a multitude of innocent out-of-door amusements, and the winter, indoor recreations. These and other simple pleasures would make her life much nearer an ideal one.

Keep your Temper.

The Rev. John B. DeMotte relates this incident, which may help to illustrate a point for the young readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

My boyhood home was not far south of the great chain of North American lakes. Our fuel was poles cut from a neighboring tamarack swamp. It was my business, after they had been brought to our yard, to saw them for proper length for the stoves. They were long and slick and hard to hold. One morning, when I was in a hurry to be off fishing, they semed to be especially aggravating. Getting the saw fast, I jerked about until finally I plunged the teeth some distance into one of my feet, making an ugly gash. My father saw the exhibition of my temper, but said nothing until I had finished my work and my passion had subsided. Then he called me to him.

"John," said he, very kindly, "I wish you would get the hammer." "Yes, sir." "Now a nail and a piece of pine board." "Here they are." "Will you drive the nail into the board?" It was done. "Please pull it out again." "That's easy." "Now, John," and father's voice dropped to a lower, sadder key, "pull out the nail-hole."

Every wrong act leaves a scar. Even if the board were a living tree, yea, a living soul, the scar remains.

WHOM WE SERVE.

LIKE birds at eve, on tired wing,
Too weary oft one note to sing,
Longing some resting place to see,
Dear Lord, we come, with hope, to Thee.

Like watcher through the dreary night,
Waiting the dawn of morning light
Hoping that better things may be,
Dear Lord, we come with faith to Thee.

The traveler worn, all dust and heat,
Hoping at length some friend to meet;
Thinking of those he longed to see,
Dear Lord, we come to rest in Thee.

Like homeless child away from friends,
Too troubled now to make amends,
To open arms he longs to flee,
Dear Lord, we find our help in Thee.

Like toilers, just at set of sun,
Much work that's hardly yet begun,
Asking for help with earnest plea,
Dear Lord, we come and trust in Thee.

COURTESY TO CHILDREN.

IF we desire our little ones to possess the grace and dignity that lend to manhood and womanhood their peculiar charm, we must begin their training in early youth. The father who touches his hat to his little daughter, who steps back and allows her to enter the room first, because she is a lady, says a thoughtful writer, does much to cultivate this manner; for a girl cannot be in the habit of receiving and acknowledging such attention without acquiring the grace which we desire for her, and the influence of it does not stop there. The little girl who is treated with such consideration, invariably responds with a loving service which must endear her to her father's heart. What another child must be bidden to do, she does spontaneously. Her feet are ready to run, and her hands ready to work for him, so that courtesy becomes what it should be, not merely a form, but the expression of love itself, and it is the habit of her life. Perhaps the truest gentleman I ever knew brought up his little daughter by the same standard of manly honor and courage that he did his son. Did he hear her retailing some bit of foolish gossip, "A lady never tells tales," would be his grave rebuke. Did she bump her head or pinch her chubby finger, her refuge was his arms, but his word was, "Courage, my soldier!" And sometimes when she had resisted a sharp temptation, or acted with spirit and decision in a sudden crisis, he would say, proudly, "that was done like a lady. Allow me to shake hands." Kisses were for every day. She was sure of his affection, and such a training naturally developed many beautiful traits of character which, added to true piety, made of her a charming Christian woman.

How to Avoid Quarrels.

My wife, writes a thoughtful husband, is one of the sweetest little women in the whole world, and I am not considered cranky, but sometimes differences arise, beginning with the most trivial things, which after being thought over and nursed, become of monumental proportions, and very often threaten the peace of the family. Of course, I have been commonly the one to blame. Sometimes I went to business without my good-by kiss, and two people were miserable all day. But my little wife had an inspiration lately, and the next time our argument was drifting near the danger line, she turned it aside by this womanly suggestion, "Dear, let's quarrel to-morrow!" This was an odd proposal, and I did not know what to make of it. "All right," I said, "we will put it off till to-morrow," and we laughed and talked of other things.

But to-morrow did not come, and our quarrel was never begun. Indeed, to-morrow never comes; it's always a day ahead; and if we can only keep our differences till then, and have Christian love in our hearts, there will be fewer heart-broken little wives at home and surly husbands at office or store, than if we nurse our differences until they explode in anger.

CHAPTER XL.

In the Sunday School.

WORK in and for the church was a delight to Annie. No trivial excuse, no ordinary rain kept her away from the house of God, but it was a great cross to her that she was not able to be a regular attendant at Sunday School. There were times when she might easily go and take a class, yet there were other times, when this would be an utter impossibility, and to be a successful teacher she knew she must be regular and punctual, so she was compelled to give up this pleasure.

Mabel and Wallace were both members of the Infant Class of the Sunday School of her church, and this class had been assigned to the ablest teacher of the school, a woman of tact, originality and deep piety. Sunday was a happy time for the children, and their cross was, not to go, but to be compelled to remain away, when it was impossible, on account of storm or sickness, for them to attend. This teacher had a sunny face and manner, and every little child felt the influence and contagion of her beaming smile, and gentle, sympathetic words. Though she was gentle, yet her discipline was firm, and no disorder ever allowed, still the little ones were not required to shut their lips tight lest a word might slip through; on the contrary, a little talking, within the bounds of moderation, was always encouraged, and opinions and remarks received her kindest consideration. Annie asked, one Sunday, the privilege of remaining in the Infant Class-room, and was delighted at the order observed, yet the freedom of the little ones. After the opening exercises were over, and the teacher was enquiring who had remembered the morning thank-prayer, who had remembered to thank God for their food, their clothes and their beds, Annie could not repress a smile when a solemn-eyed little boy broke in with, "My bed is not very good now, my mamma is going to make it over this week," and another, "Mrs. Jones, them's my coat and pants brother Willie's got on. Mamma give 'um to him 'cause I'd outgrowd um."

Then came a little plaintive voice of a wee girl: "Oh, Mrs. Jones, we is so scrowded up here."

Mrs. Jones noticed every speaker, sympathized with the first, admired the second, order was restored, and the lesson proceeded with an occasional interruption. What a refreshing class, Annie thought! At the close the teacher tried to impress upon the children the importance of "total abstinence." A beautiful, bright-eyed little boy on the front bench interrupted her with; "I've seen my papa drunk many a time."

It was a sad close to the appeal. Some of the children tried to smile, but most of them looked solemn, and Annie's eyes overflowed.

She thought this was the very sweetest, most satisfying class in the school, Who would ever weary or grow impatient teaching these precious children. When school was dismissed, she took the teacher's hand and said:

"Mrs. Jones, I thank you for the pleasure you have given me. I have indeed spent a most delightful hour in your room. You certainly have a sweet charge. I envy you your talent, and your opportunity."

"I am glad to have given you any pleasure, Mrs. Gordon. Mine is, as you say, a sweet charge. I love my work, I love the little darlings, yet mine is the most trying position in the whole school, I do not murmur that the labor in this room is hardest, and that I have to make better preparation for it than for any other class. I do not murmur that I am never allowed to see the good I may be permitted to do — these things do not trouble me. My business is to sow, it is given to others to do the reaping. I have to prepare the ground, keep it fallow, drop in good seed, but the harvest is another's. What proportion of the reward at the end will be mine, I do not stop to inquire. Always my arm must go round in a broad sweep, sowing, sowing, sowing—and there I must stop. I do not murmur at this, but my great trial is, that just as I begin to get an influence over the little ones, just as I see a little improvement, just as they twine themselves around my heart and I learn to love them tenderly, they are taken from me and passed up to a higher class, they are mine no longer. New ones come in, and at the time when I love them most they, too, are passed up and out of my reach,—yes, out of the reach of my arm perhaps, but not out of the reach of my prayers. Every day I not only pray that some seed I drop may bring forth fruit for my Master's glory, but I have to beg for strength to sustain me, in this, the most trying part of my work as teacher."

Annie thanked God that her children had such a teacher, one whose love encircled her class, whose sole motive was God's glory, and one who lived in an atmosphere of prayer. After this visit and conversation, her interest in the infant class deepened, and she never ceased to remember the loving teacher at the throne of grace.

Not only was she careful that her children always knew and understood their lessons, but she was very particular about the contributions. She and her husband had consulted together upon this subject, and had come to the wise conclusion, that money given had double power when earned, not only was it a power for good from its own value, but when earned it was a benefit to the giver as well. Each Sunday these two children carried a few cents that they themselves had earned for the contribution box, and, if by chance, through indifference or neglect, they did not feel disposed to work for the money, they were not reproved, but they were not given the usual amount to make up for the deficiency. Wallace, through interest in something else, found himself one Saturday night without a cent for Sunday School, and this time he borrowed from his sister, promising to pay her the next week, which he did. The parents knew this and did not object upon this occasion, though it was understood then that borrowing could never be allowed again. The result of this system was, that these children, though small, always went through the routine of some daily work and always received for it regular, stipulated pay. From the money they were encouraged to make an offering of their own.

While Annie trained her children in the right way, she did not neglect to discipline her own heart. Connected with her church were two Societies, the Missionary Society of which Mrs. Travilla was President, the other a Dorcas Society, of which Mrs. Mashona was President. To both of these Annie belonged, and in both she labored faithfully. Although in her days of opulence she had never known anything of sewing, ordering all of her dresses from abroad and keeping a seamstress for plainer sewing, yet now, since her marriage, she had applied herself assiduously to her work, and now most of the sewing for the family was done by her own hands. Perhaps those hands might not now be so fair, so delicate, so free from blemishes as in the days of idle leisure, but they were even more beautiful, because they dispensed blessings freely.

CHAPTER XLI.

"Ask and it shall be given you."

"Roy has just been here to invite us to spend to-morrow at his house," said Annie one morning as her husband entered her room. "You can go, can you not?"

"I wish I could say yes at once, Annie, but I have a very pressing case out of town, and I just stepped in to beg for an earlier breakfast than usual to-morrow morning. I am very sorry, for I would be glad to go with you and the children, but I will be debarred this pleasure."

"I hoped you might visit your patients in the morning, and meet us at dinner and give us the remaining hours of the day."

"I fear even this will be impossible to-morrow, 'Business before pleasure,' little woman."

"I see I will have to yield, but I fear it is not done with a very good grace. I am so sorry for you to be shut out of all these family gatherings, especially to-morrow, for it's mamma's birth-day."

"Is it? Then I am especially sorry."

"Mamma will be fifty to-morrow. She spoke sadly of this coming birth-day to me the other day; said 'now the journey is all down hill.' Poor mamma, these last few years of her life have been sad indeed. If I were only sure of her being a Christian, I should feel so different about the remainder of her journey through life."

"Do not fear, dear, your prayers will yet be answered, and I have faith to believe that your entire family will at no distant day be a God-fearing, God-loving people."

"God grant it!" exclaimed Annie from a full heart."

The next morning Dr. Gordon bade his family "good-by" at an early hour, and soon his buggy was rattling over the stony streets, through the bridge that spanned the river, and soon he had left the city far out of sight. As early as possible after breakfast, Annie, her three children and nurse were in the street car which passed her brother's house. She and her children each carried a souvenir to her mother in remembrance of the day, nor did her husband forget to add his gift to theirs. Both families were in holiday attire, and an elegant dinner had been ordered for the occasion. After greetings had been interchanged, and conversation been general for some time, Annie took occasion to draw Roy into the parlor, and when there she said: "Roy, my darling brother, I want you to grant me a favor."

"Well, my dear Annie, it is granted before you ask it."

"Take care, Roy, it may be very different from what you suppose, and when you learn its nature you may not feel so willing to consent."

"I am willing to risk it. You are the most reasonable woman I know, and I know your request is reasonable, so I agree."

"I will not accept your consent until you hear what I want at your hands. Listen! I want you to educate four poor children."

"Whew! Next thing you'll want me to do the teaching. Goodness! Annie, what do you mean! I don't love to prowl about in hovels, and kiss little dirty faces, as you do—but go on, explain yourself. You startled me so I had to say something."

"I am willing for you to say as much as you please, Roy, just so your words are followed by acts. I will put all the cases before your eyes, tell you what I want you to do by way of relief, and then leave it to your own good, generous heart to decide.

"Case first is this: Jessie Withers lives with her old blind grandfather, who aids her mother in the support of the family by making baskets and mats. The mother goes out to work. Jessie has uncommon mental powers, reads a great deal and remembers all she reads. Now if she were educated, she could aid very materially in the support of the family. Mrs. Somers induced a lady to undertake this great work, but the lady died about two months ago.

"Case second is different. Mr. Flint had his leg crushed by some falling timber years ago, and he has had a long struggle to get strong. He had just recovered from a spell of typhoid fever when the accident occurred, which made it harder for him to recover. His oldest boy, George, has occupied the position of errand boy in a store, but if he had an education he could fill a better, more lucrative place.

"Case third: Jim Howard's father drinks, but he is making earnest efforts to burst the fetters that have bound him so many years. I carried him an antidote for whisky a month ago, and it is really acting like a charm, and I have great hope that he will yet become a sober man. They have a large family of children and his wife is an invalid. If I can get Jim educated, you can see yourself what good he can accomplish.

"Case fourth: Nannie Goode is the child of a widow, who has a spinal affliction and soon she will be perfectly helpless. I must get Nannie educated, so that when her mother fails in health, she can support them both comfortly.

"I said there were four cases, but here is case fifth:

"Mrs. Hunter is a poor woman who has seen better days. Her husband was once a prosperous merchant, but his partner absconded with a large amount. Her husband died soon after leaving her penniless. She is finely educated, but she has no relatives, no child to aid her in her distressed condition. After her husband's death she tried to take in washing, and now her hands are drawn into terrible knots by rheumatism, so that she can hardly dress herself. Now I wish to make her the teacher of these four children, pay her liberally, say four dollars for each, pay the same amount to each child's family, for since while they will be going to school they will not be able to aid their families. You see by this arrangement I am giving relief to four families and educating four worthy children.—Now, Roy, you have heard me through patiently, what do you say, my brother, to the favor I ask at your hands?"

"Annie," and Roy's voice was very gentle, "have you, with your children and your household cares—have you found time to assist all these people?"

"Yes, Roy, I try to work for others. Charity may begin at home, but I am very sure it should not end there. My dear brother, if you would only go with me and witness some of the scenes of wretchness and squalor that my own eyes have seen, it would do your own heart good. You do not dream how much suffering there is in this beautiful city. If you would go and view the depths far below you, your heart would swell with gratitude and praise to God for his manifold gifts to you. You have had blessings beyond all computation. The world would say that your large wealth was due to prudence on your part and uncommon business qualifications, but, dear Roy, who endowed you with this mind, gave you this foresight, this caution in your business transactions, this knowledge of human nature that you may judge the men with whom you deal? Who has blessed you with a loving wife, with sweet, darling children? Who has given you health, and kept death far from the door? I asked this favor a moment since for my sake. I change the request; I ask it now for my Saviour's sake, that you will give this as a thank-offering to him for his great goodness to you."

Roy's eyes were dewy when he raised them to Annie's face. There was a moment's pause, and then he said:

"Your request is granted. I grant it for your sake, Annie, and for the sake of your Saviour. Once, my dear sister, I gloried in being a sceptic, in declaring that I did not believe in God, in Christ, and in the Bible. I tried hard to be an infidel, and persuaded myself that I was one, but your beautiful life, the wonderful change in you, your firmness in adhering to your Saviour, notwithstanding the godlessness of this family, your gentleness when I jeered, your decided refusal to attend places of amusement which you thought improper, your spotless record as a Christian, have done more to convince me of the reality of the religion of Christ than all the arguments of the ablest divines I ever listened to."

"Thank God," said Annie devoutly. "O, Roy, I have hoped and prayed for your conversion. God is answering my prayers."

"Do not mistake me, Annie; I am not a Christian. All I say now, is that my attitude toward religion is changed. You have caused me to respect Christianity by your conduct. I see how it has changed you, I confess that at first I did not like the change, but I soon saw that you were happier for it and I was not long in finding out that you made other people happier. You have made us happier and you have done a lot of good outside the family. So I came to the conclusion that the world would be a much better world if there were more Christians—in fact that Christianity was a good thing. That was what I meant just now in saying I would do what you ask about educating these children and do it for your Saviour's sake. I have looked into these matters somewhat since I began to change my ideas of Christianity under the influence of your life. It seems to me as far as I can see, that the best kind of life is one that follows Christ's example—good and doing good. I am sick of this idle, frivolous, pleasure-loving, money-grubbing mode of existence. It leads to nothing. I am strongly inclined to cast in my lot with you and ask you to make a Christian of me if you can. That is as far as I have come yet."

"O, my brother, I am thankful; heartily thankful; you are not far from the kingdom of God."

"I SHALL SEE HIM."

By the late Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D.

I SHALL see the King in his beauty.
In the land that is far away.
When the shadows at length have lifted,
And the darkness has turned to day.

Behold the Chief of ten thousand,
Ah! my soul, this is joy enough:
'Till suffice for the bliss of heaven,
That the Lamb is the light thereof.

Who can tell the rapturous meeting,
When the Lord shall bring home his own,
When one sight all his saints are ravished,
The Lamb in the midst of the throne.

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

A SERMON IN A HOTEL.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary now conducting the relief work in Kansas, writes from Almena: Our train was two hours late in starting from Lincoln and at Belleville, Kan., having to change cars, I remained there over four hours to take the next train; but it also was two hours or more behind time. This kept me in the village hotel the earlier part of the night, and a trio of colored young men entertained the guests and villagers with weird songs and musical instruments,—a banjo, tambourine and mandolin. The music gathered a very orderly crowd of men, women and children (white people) and after the entertainment, with the approval of the host and hostess, I availed myself of the opportunity to preach a short sermon on the great salvation. My train having arrived soon afterwards I boarded it, and reached the depot for Almena about two o'clock A M

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies: but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitute. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease and a feeling of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases. any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00 according to the size of the bottle ordered.

A MINISTER'S NOURISHMENT.

"Meat which endureth unto eternal life," is no fiction. When Dr Raleigh, was on his death bed, his body became emaciated to an extraordinary degree. His disease prevented him from deriving nourishment from the food he ate. But his mind was clear and vigorous as of yore Mrs. Raleigh says that when he was near death some food was brought to him at the usual hour, but he put it gently away. "No," he said, "I do not want it; the bread of life is near." It was upon that bread, which nourished his soul that he was feeding, and on the support thus derived his soul would survive the dissolution of his body and live on through the ages.

HENDERSON'S NEW DOUBLE SWEET PEAS.

A Glorious Floral Novelty unrivaled for BEAUTY GRACE AND FRAGRANCE

We have great satisfaction in being the first to offer something really new—DOUBLE FLOWERING SWEET PEAS. The varieties, 3 in number, are of incomparable beauty. One is a superb blush pink suffused with deep rose; another is as white as the driven snow; while the third is a gorgeous shade of crimson rose.

The flowers are unusually large in size and the effect of the extra number of petals, all of which are gracefully curved and daintily frilled, is to reflect tinted and varying shades into the depths of the flower, intensifying the brilliancy of the already rich colorings and giving them a much more massive appearance than the single varieties. The fascinating contrasts and ever changing colors are enhanced by their delicious fragrance, and as they remain fresh after cutting for a longer period, they are destined to outrival the single varieties which are now fashion's floral favorites.

All the flowers will not come double. Usually half the flowers on a stem are double and the other half are single; sometimes stems bear only singles, and other stems bear all doubles.

A complete description and colored plate of this new floral beauty will be found in our 1895 Catalogue of "EVERYTHING for the GARDEN," which we will send FREE with every order from this advertisement, when this paper is mentioned. If Catalogue alone is wanted, it will be mailed on receipt of 20 cents. As every copy however, with postage, costs us 25 cents, you will find it more advantageous to order the NEW DOUBLE SWEET PEAS and get for nothing a Catalogue of 160 pages containing nearly 500 engravings and 8 beautiful colored plates, in fact the most superb publication of its kind ever issued.

Price 25 cents per packet (3 sorts in mixture).

Postage stamps accepted as cash.

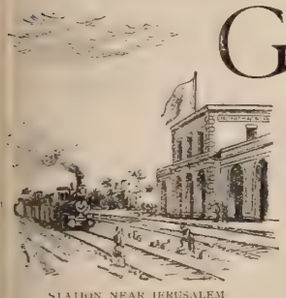
Railroad-Building in Palestine.

A Great Transformation in Progress in the Holy Land—Ancient modes of Travel Discarded and a Network of Lines Gradually Extending from Egypt to Damascus.



STATION NEAR JERUSALEM

GREAT changes have taken place in Palestine within a few years, and still others are now in progress, which are destined to have a most important influence upon the future of that most interesting portion of the globe. Less than ten years ago, the Holy Land was still undisturbed in its venerable antiquity; its historic plains silent and untrodden, save by the wandering Bedouin, the peasant, or an occasional party of pilgrims. Even as recently as 1889, when Dr. Klopsch and Rev Dr Talmage together visited the Holy Land, the undertaking was a laborious one in consequence of the poor facilities for land travel in Palestine proper.

To-day, however, all is changed. That wondrous transformation has taken place which Dr. Talmage partly foreshadowed when, in the course of his series of Palestine sermons, he declared that the inhabitants of that ancient land would yet be stirred up to new life by the introduction of railways, and that the slow Oriental ears at Joppa would become habituated to the cry, "All aboard for Jerusalem!" or "Change cars for Damascus!" Railroad building has been progressing continuously during the last three years, and the line between Joppa and Jerusalem, the opening of which was duly chronicled in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in 1892, has been followed by surveys for other roads, several of which are now in course of construction The scene shown in our illustration, where sturdy Arabs and Syrian laborers from Bethlehem and Beit jala are engaged under European engineers, in building a section of one of the new roads—is not now an unfamiliar one in many parts of Palestine One of these roads—a narrow-guage line between Beyrout and Damascus—is being constructed by a French syndicate. An English syndicate has surveyed, and is now building, a seventy-five mile line from Haifa to Damascus, which will be one of the most important branches of a great railway system that will girdle the Holy Land from North to South. It begins at Haifa with a short eight-mile branch around the famous Bay of Acre to Akka; thence it will run along the northern base of the range of Carmel, and on to the battle storied plain of Esdraelon, passing the villages of Nain, Jezreel and Beisan, with the possibility of touching near Nazareth. On leaving Mount Tabor, as indicated by the surveys, it will skirt the plain of Butt hauf, crossing the Jordan on a trestle near Majameh ("the Bridge of Meeting"), where the Little Jordan joins the main stream.

Then, for a brief distance, it will run along the southern shore of the Lake of Tiberias and diverge into the great wheat-growing region of Syria, known as "the Hauran" (referred to in the Bible as "the Plains of Bashan"), and continue till the terminus is reached at the southern gate of Damascus, the whole length being about 120 miles from the point of starting. This road, which has been estimated to cost $10,000,000, will, when completed, open up to the East large agricultural and manufacturing interests, and will greatly aid in bringing about renewed prosperity to a country whose commerce has long been stagnant. Meanwhile, Belgian capitalists, it is reported, have undertaken to build a seventy-five mile road from Damascus into the Hauran, for the purpose of aiding the development of the grain trade, and the Joppa road, now in operation, is to have a branch running along the coast to Gaza, in ancient Philistia, which may be continued to Port Said in Egypt.

Under the influence of this new element, Palestine, and indeed all Syria, is beginning to feel the throbbings of a new life more in touch with the activity and progress of the Western world. Travelers who have recently visited Jerusalem and Joppa tell of the impetus that has been given to those communities by the advent of the railroad there, and it is significant that building is more active than before, and that the railroad centres are growing in population Thus the Land of the Book, of Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs, the land of the Saviour and the birth-place of Christianity, is being opened up to the world at a time when the sons of Israel themselves are returning to their native soil in numbers that would seem to many observers to indicate an early fulfilment of prophecy.

A SNOWY DAY.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, N. Y. Text: I.Chron. 11: 22: "He went down and slew a lion in a pit in a snowy day."

HAVE you ever heard of him? His name was Benaiah. He was a man of stout muscle and of great avoirdupois. His father was a hero, and he inherited prowess. He was athletic and there was iron in his blood, and the strongest bone in his body was back-bone. He is known for other wonders beside that of the text. An Egyptian five cubits in stature, or about seven feet nine inches high, was moving around in braggadocia and flourishing a great spear, careless as to whom he killed, and Benaiah of my text, with nothing but a walking-stick came upon him, snatched the spear from the Egyptian, and with one thrust of its sharp edge, put an end to the blatant bully, which makes us think of the story in our Greek lesson too hard for us if the smarter boy on the same bench had not helped us out with it, in which Horatius the Macedonian, and Dioxippus the Athenian, fought in the presence of Alexander: the Macedonian armed with shield and sword and javelin, and the Athenian with nothing but a club. The Macedonian hurled the javelin, but the Athenian successfully dodged it, and the Macedonian lifted the spear, but the Athenian with the club broke it, and the Macedonian drew the sword, but the Athenian tripped him up before he could strike with it, and then the Athenian with his club would have beaten the life out of the Macedonian, fallen among his useless weapons, if Alexander had not commanded, "Stop! Stop!" But Benaiah of the text is about to do something that will eclipse even that. There is trouble in all the neighborhood. Lambs are carried off in the night, and children venturing only a little way from their father's house are found mangled and dead. The fact is, the land was infested with lions, and few people dared meet one of these grizzly beasts, much less corner or attack it. As a good Providence would have it, one morning a footstep of a lion was tracked in the snow. It had been out on its devouring errand through the darkness, but at last it is found by the impression of the four paws on the white surface of the ground, which way the wild beast came, and which way it had gone. Perilous undertaking: but Benaiah, the hero of the text, arms himself with such weapons as those early days afforded, gunpowder having been invented in a far subsequent century by the German monk, Bertholdus Schwartz. Therefore, without gun or any kind of firearms, Benaiah of the text no doubt depended on the sharp steel edge for his own defense and the slaughter of the lion as he followed the track through the snow. It may have been a javelin, it may have been only a knife; but what Benaiah lacks in weapon he will make up in strength of arm and skill of stroke. But where is the lion? We must not get off his track in the snow. The land has many cisterns, or pits, for catching rain, the rainfall being very scarce at certain seasons, and hence these cisterns, or reservoirs are digged here, and there, and yonder. Lions have an instinct which seems to tell them when they are pursued, and this dread monster of which I speak, retreats into one of these cisterns which happened to be free of water, and is there panting from the long run, and licking its jaws after a repast of human flesh, and after quaffing the red vintage of human blood.

Benaiah is all alert, and comes cautiously on toward the hiding-place of this terror of the fields. Coming to the verge of the pit, he looks down at the lion, and the lion looks up at him. What a moment it was when their eyes clashed! But while a modern Du Chaillu, Gordon Cumming or Sir Samuel Baker, or David Livingstone would have just brought the gun to the shoulder, and held the eye against the barrel, and blazed away into the depths, and finished the beast, Benaiah, with only the old-time weapon, can do nothing until he gets on a level with the beast, and so he jumps into the pit, and the lion with shining teeth of rage, and claws lifted to tear to shreds the last vestige of human life, springs for the man, while Benaiah springs for the beast. But the quick stroke of the steel edge flashed again, and again, and again, until the snow was no longer white, and the right foot of triumphant Benaiah is half covered with the tawny mane of the slain horror of Palestine.

Now you see how emphatic, and tragic, and tremendous are the words of my text: "He went down and slew a lion in a pit in a snowy day." Why put that in the Bible? Why put it twice in the Bible, once in the book of Samuel, and here in the book of Chronicles? Oh the practical lessons are so many for you and for me. What a cheer in this subject for all those of you who are in conjunction of hostile circumstances. Three things were against Benaiah of my text in the moment of combat, the snow that impeded his movement, the pit that environed him in a small space, and the lion, with open jaws and uplifted paw. And yet I hear the shout of Benaiah's victory. Oh, men and women of three troubles. You say, "I could stand one, and I think I could stand two; but three are at least one too many."

There is a man in business perplexity, and who has sickness in his family, and old age is coming on. Three troubles: a lion, a pit and snowy day. There is a good woman with failing health, and a dissipated husband, and a wayward boy—three troubles! There is a young man, salary cut down, bad cough, frowning future—three troubles! There is a maiden with difficult school lessons she cannot get, a face that is not as attractive as some of her schoolmates, a prospect that through hard times she must quit school before she graduates — three troubles! There is an author, his manuscript rejected, his power of origination in decadence, a numbness in fore-finger and thumb, which threatens paralysis—three troubles! There is a reporter of fine taste sent to report a pugilism instead of an oratorio, the copy he hands in rejected because the paper is full, a mother to support on small income —three troubles! I could march right off these seats, and across this platform, if they would come at my call, five hundred people with three troubles. This is the opportunity to play the hero or the heroine, not on a small stage with a few hundred people to clap their approval, but with all the galleries of heaven filled with sympathetic and applauding spectators, for we are "surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses." My brother, my sister, my father, my mother, what a chance you have! While you are in the struggle, if you only have the grace of Christ to listen, a voice parts the heavens, saying, "My grace is sufficient for thee;" "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth;" "You shall be more than conquerors." And that reminds me of a letter on my table written by some one whom I suppose to be at this moment present, saying: "My dear, dear Doctor: You will please pardon the writer for asking that at some time when you feel like it, you kindly preach from the 30th Psalm, 5th verse: 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning,' and much oblige a downtown business man." So to all downtown business men, and to all uptown business men, I say: if you have on hand goods that you cannot sell, and debtors who will not, or cannot, pay, and you are also suffering from uncertainty as to what the imbecile American Congress will do about the tariff, you have three troubles, and enough to bring you within the range of the consolation of my text, where you find the triumph of Benaiah over a lion, and a pit, and a snowy day. If you have only one trouble, I cannot spend any time with you to-day. You must have at least three, and then remember how many have triumphed over such a triad of misfortune. Paul had three troubles: Sanhedrin denouncing him — that was one great trouble; physical infirmity, which he called "a thorn in the flesh," and although we know not what the thorn was, we do know from the figure he used that it must have been something that stuck him —that was the second trouble; approaching martyrdom—that made the three troubles. Yet, hear what he says: "If I had only one misfortune, I could stand that; but three are two too many?" No: I misinterpret. He says, "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things." "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

David had three troubles: a bad boy, a temptation to dissoluteness, and dethronement. What does he say? "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble. Therefore, will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be cast into the midst of the sea."

John Wesley had three troubles: Defamation by mobs; domestic infelicity; fatigue from more sermons preached and more miles traveled than almost any man of his time. What does he say? "The best of all is, God is with us." And when his poet brother, Charles Wesley, said to him, "Brother John, if the Lord were to give me wings, I'd fly," John's reply was, "Brother Charles, if the Lord told me to fly, I'd do it, and leave him to find the wings."

George Whitefield had three troubles: Rejection from the pulpits of England because he was too dramatic — that was one trouble; strabismus, or the crossing of his eyes that subjected him to the caricature of all the small wits of the day; vermin and dead animals thrown at him while he preached on the commons—that made three troubles. Nevertheless, his sermons were so buoyant that a little child dying soon after hearing him preach said in the intervals of pain, "Let me go to Mr. Whitefield's God." Oh, I am so glad that Benaiah of my text was not the only one who triumphed over a lion in a pit on a snowy day.

Notice in my text a victory over bad weather. It was a snowy day, when one's vitality is at a low ebb, and the spirits are naturally depressed, and one does not feel like undertaking a great enterprise, when Benaiah rubs his hands together to warm them by extra friction, or threshes his arms around him to revive circulation of the blood, and then goes at the lion, which was all the more fierce and ravenous because of the sharp weather. Inspiration here admits atmospheric hindrance. The snowy day at Valley Forge well nigh put an end to the struggle for American independence. The snowy day demolished Napoleon's army on the way from Moscow. The inclemency of January and February weather has some years bankrupted thousands of merchants. Long succession of stormy Sabbaths has crippled innumerable churches. Lighthouses veiled by the snow on many a coast have failed to warn off from the rocks the doomed frigate. Tens of thousands of Christians of nervous temperament by the depression of a snowy day almost despair of reaching heaven. Yet, in that style of weather Benaiah of the text achieved his most celebrated victory; and let us by the grace of God become victors over influences atmospheric. If we are happy only when the wind blows from the clear northwest, and the thermometer is above freezing point and the sky is an inverted blue cup of sunshine poured all over us, it is a religion ninety-five per cent. off. Thank God there are Christians, who, though their whole life through sickness has been a snowy day, have killed every lion of despondency that dared to put its cruel paw against their suffering pillow. It was a snowy day when the pilgrim fathers set foot, not on a bank of flowers, but on the cold New England rock, and from a ship that might have been more appropriately called after a December hurricane than after a "Mayflower," they took possession of this great continent. And amid more chilly worldly circumstances many a good man or a good woman has taken possession of a whole continent of spiritual satisfaction, valleys of peace, and rivers of gladness, and mountains of joy. Christ landed in our world not in the month of May, but in the stormy month of December, to show us that we might have Christ in winter weather, and on a snowy day.

Notice everything down in the pit that snowy day depended upon Benaiah's weapon. There was as much strength in one muscle of that lion as in all the muscles of both arms of Benaiah. It is the strongest of beasts, and has been known to carry off an ox. Its tongue is so rough that it acts as a rasp tearing off the flesh it licks. The two great canines at each side of the mouth make escape impossible for anything it has once seized. Yet Benaiah puts his heel on the neck of this "king of beasts." Was it a dagger? Was it a javelin? Was it a knife? I cannot tell, but everything depended on it. But for that, Benaiah's body under one craunch of the monster would have been left limp and tumbled in the snow. And when you and I go into the fight with temptation, if we have not the right kind of weapon, instead of our slaying the lion, the lion will slay us. The sword of the Spirit! Nothing in earth or hell can stand before that. Victory with that, or no victory at all. By that I mean prayer to God, confidence in his rescuing power, saving grace, Almighty deliverance. I do not care what you call it; I call it "Sword of the Spirit." And if the lions of all the jungles of perdition should at once spring upon your soul, by that weapon of heavenly metal you can thrust them back and cut them down, and stab them through and leave them powerless at your feet. Your good resolution wielded against the powers which assault you is a toy pistol against an Armstrong gun; is a pen-knife held out against the brandished sabres of Heintzelman's cavalry charge. Go into the fight against sin on your own strength, and the result will be the hot breath of the lion in your blanched face, and his front paws one on each lung. Alas! for the man not fully armed, down in the pit, on a snowy day, and before him a lion.

All my hearers and readers have a big fight of some sort on hand, but the biggest and the wrathiest lion which you have to fight is what the Bible calls "The roaring lion, who walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." Now, you have never see real lion unless you have seen him in India or Africa, just after capture. Long caging breaks his spirit, and the constant presence of human beings tames him. But you ought to see him spring against the iron bars in the Zoological Gardens of Calcutta, and hear him roar for the prey. It makes one's blood curdle, and you shrink back, although you know there is no peril. Plenty of lions in olden time. Six hundred of them were slaughtered on one occasion in the presence of Pompey in the Roman Amphitheatre. Lions came out and destroyed the camels which carried the baggage of Xerxes' army. In Bible times there were so many lions that they are frequentiy alluded to in the Scriptures. Joel, the prophet, describes the "cheek teeth" of a great lion; and Isaiah mentions among the attractions of heaven that "No lion shall be there;" Solomon describes the righteous as "bold as a lion;" and Daniel was a great lion-tamer; and David, and Jeremiah, and St. John often speak of this creature.

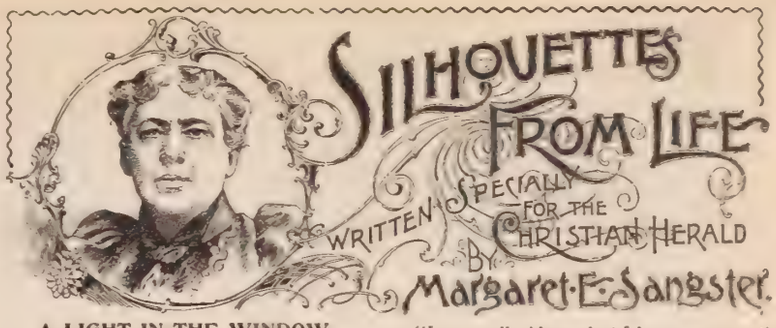
But most am I impressed by what I have quoted from the Apostle Peter when he calls the devil a lion. That means strength. That means bloodthirstiness. That means cruelty. Yes, he is a savage devil. He roared at everything good when Lord Claverhouse assailed the Covenanters, and at Bartholomew against the Huguenots, one August night when the bell tolled for the butchery to begin, and the ghastly joke in the street was, "Blood letting is good in August," and 50,000 assassin knives were plunged into the victims, and this monster has had under his jaw many of the grandest souls of all time, and fattened with the spoils of centuries, he comes for you. But I am glad to say to all of you who have got the worst in such a struggle, that there is a Lion on our side, if you want him: Revelation 5: 5, "The Lion of Judah's tribe." A Lamb to us, but a Lion to meet that other lion, and you can easily guess who will beat in that fight, and who will be beaten. When two opposing lions meet in a jungle in India, you cannot tell which will overcome and which will be overcome. But if you and I feel enough our weakness in this battle of temptation, and ask for the Divine help, against that old lion of hell, described in St. Peter, will go the stronger Lion described in Revelation, and it will be no uncertain grapple, but under one Omnipotent stroke the devouring monster that would slay our soul, shall go reeling back into a pit ten thousand times deeper than that in which Benaiah slew the lion on a snowy day.

A word to all who are in a snowy day. Oh, fathers and mothers who have lost children, that is the weather that cuts through body and soul. But drive back the lion of bereavement with the thought which David Rae, of Edinburgh, got from the Scotch grave-digger, who was always planting white clover and the sweetest flowers on the children's graves in the cemetery, and when asked why he did so, replied: "Surely, sir, I canna make ower fine the bed coverin' o' a little innocent sleeper that's waitin' there till it's God's time to waken it, and cover it with the white robe, and waft it away to glory. When sic grandeur is waitin' it yonder, it's fit it should be decked oot here. I think the Saviour that counts its dust sae precious will like to see the white clover sheet spread ower it. Do ye no' think so too, sir?" Cheer up all disconsolates. The best work for God and humanity has been done on the snowy day. At gloomy "Marine Terrace," Island of Jersey, the exile Victor Hugo wrought the mightiest achievement of his pen. Ezekiel, banished and bereft and an invalid at Cornhill, on the banks of the Chebar, had his momentous vision of the Cherubim, and wheels within wheels. By the dim light of a dungeon window at Bedford, John Bunyan sketches the "Delectable Mountains." Milton writes the greatest poem of all time without eyes. Michael Angelo carved a statue out of snow and all Florence gazed in raptures at its exquisiteness, and many of God's servants have out of the cold cut their immortality. Persecutions were the dark back-ground that made more impressive the courage and consecration of Savonarola who, when threatened with denial of burial, said: "Throw me into the Arno if you choose, the Resurrection Day will find me and that is enough." Benaiah, on a cold, damp, cutting, snowy day gained leonine triumph. Hardship and trouble have again and again exalted, and inspired, and glorified their subjects.

The bush itself has mounted higher
And flourished, unconsumed, in fire.

Well, we have had many snowy days within the past month, and added to the chill of the weather was the chilling dismay at the non-arrival of the ocean steamer "Gascogne." Overdue for eight days, many had given her up as lost, and the most hopeful were very anxious. The cyclones, whose play is shipwrecks, had been reported being in wildest romp all up and down the Atlantic. The ocean a few days before had swallowed the "Elbe," and with unappeased appetite seemed saying, "Give us more of the best shipping." The "Normandie" came in on the same track the "Gascogne" was to travel, and it had not seen her. The "Teutonic," saved almost by the superhuman efforts of captain and crew, came in and had heard no gun of distress from that missing steamer. There were pale faces and wringing hands on both continents, and tears rolled down cold cheeks on those snowy days. We all feared that the worst had happened, and talked of the "City of Boston" as never heard of after sailing. But at last, under most powerful glass at Fire Island, a ship was seen limping this way over the waters. Then we all began to hope that it might be the missing French liner. Three hours of tedious and agonizing waiting, and two continents in suspense! When will the eyeglasses at Fire Island make revelation of this awful mystery of the sea? There it is! Ha! Ha! The "Gascogne"! Quick! Wire the news to the city. Swing the flags out on the towers. Ring the bells. Sound the whistles of the shipping all the way up from Sandy Hook to New York Battery. "She's safe! She's safe!" are the words caught up, and passed on from street to street. "It is the 'Gascogne'!" is the cry sounding through all our delighted homes, and thrilling all the telegraphic wires of the continent and all the cables under the sea, and the huzza on the wharf as the gang-planks were swung out for the disembarkation, was a small part of the huzza that lifted both hemispheres into exultation. The flakes of snow fell on the "Extra" as we opened it on the street to get the latest particulars.

Well, it will be better than that when some of you are seen entering the harbor of Heaven. You have had a rough voyage—no mistake about that. Snowy day after snowy day. Again and again the machinery of health and courage broke down, and the waves of temptation have swept clear over the hurricane deck, so that you were often compelled to say, "All thy waves and thy billows have gone over me," and you were down in the trough of that sea, and down in the trough of the other sea, and many despaired of your safe arrival. But the great Pilot, not one who must come off from some other craft, but the One who walked storm-swept Galilee, and now walks the wintry Atlantic, comes on board, and heads you for the haven, when no sooner have you passed the Narrows of death than you find all the banks lined with immortals celebrating your arrival; and while some break off palm branches from the banks and wave them, those standing on one side will chant, "There shall be no more sea;" and those standing on the other side will chant, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." Off of the stormy sea into the smooth harbor. Out of leonine struggle in the pit, to guidance by the Lamb, who shall lead you to living fountains of water. Out of the snowy day of earthly severities into the gardens of everlasting flora, and into orchards of eternal fruitage, the fall of their white blossoms the only snow in heaven.



A LIGHT IN THE WINDOW.

A light in the window for thee, brother,
A light in the window for thee!

TWO old people, a brother and a sister, lived together in a small apartment at the top of a tall house in a crowded street. Many years ago they had been blithe-hearted children, running wild and free over a rocky hillside farm in New England, children of godly parents, trained in everything that belonged to an orderly Christian life. Morning and evening there were prayers in their father's house, and Abner and Jenny were never absent. Sabbath by Sabbath the family went to church always twice, and Abner and Jenny were as regularly in their places in the pew as the minister was in his place in the pulpit.

Time, which changes so many things, brought great changes to the house in which these little ones lived. First, the father died, then the mother. Relations came in, who sold the little property according to the Deacon's will, for the benefit of the children, and the children themselves were taken to the city, sent to school, and, in time, taught bread-winning trades. Abner became an architect. Jenny learned the art of millinery. Both were proficient in their work, honest and industrious, and they prospered and laid aside their savings, and in thrift and independence the years went over their heads, till gradually the heads grew gray, and the alert young steps slackened and sobered as age crept on.

In early life Jenny had given her heart to Jesus. She did this without struggle, without conflict, as happy and as naturally as a bud unfolds into a flower, or a child develops into maturity. From the moment of her conscience awakening to the conviction of sin and of the need of a Saviour to the moment of her dropping the load at the foot of the Cross, and saying, "Take my life, and let it be consecrated, Lord, to thee!" the interval was too slight to be appreciated or measured. Joining the Lord Jesus, Jenny joined the church, as a matter of course, and took her share in whatever work the church had for her to do.

With Abner, it was different. As a young man he came under the influence of sceptical literature, then he fell in with a set of clever but superficial people, who fancied themselves able to sound the depths of philosophy, when a pebble would have splashed hard against the shallows of their ignorance. Abner was out in the cold and the storm of unbelief, while Jenny knew the warm glow and the sweet shelter of a Christian's anchorage, a Christian's hope.

Devoted to one another with only this little rift within the lute, the two, as I have said, grew old. Jenny was fond of music. She had a little, old-fashioned parlor organ, and as she would sit in the twilight coaxing familiar tunes note by note, with her thin, white fingers, and singing in a thin, high voice, cracked and quavering, but still sweet, her brother liked to listen to her, and often swelled the strain with his deeper tones. "Jerusalem, the Golden," "Am I a Soldier of the Cross?" "While Shepherds watched their flocks by night," "There is a Fountain filled with blood," were among their favorites. And none were more entirely beloved by both than some of the Gospel hymns; even some of the older ones which you do not so often hear now, were dear to Abner and Jenny.

"There's a light in the window for thee, brother!" Jenny sang one night, closing the organ afterward, and going to her brother to give him the kiss which had ended every day for fifty years or more. She passed her hand over his thick white hair, and said softly:

"Dear, dear Abner! We won't be much longer together!"

"Sister!" he exclaimed, startled and paling, "why do you speak so? It is not like you to be a prophet of evil. Are you not well?"

"I am well, Abner, but I have a presentiment that we are soon to be separated. Brother, if the Lord calls me first, remember there'll be a light in the window for thee! Heaven would not be heaven for me without my brother Abner!"

Months passed, and the conversation, which had much impressed the brother at first, faded from his memory; faded that is, as much as most things do, for I question if we ever really forget anything. The brain is like the old Greek palimpsests, with records written one upon another, all imperishable, all easily revived, when the right moment comes.

One morning, Jenny was not able to sit up for breakfast. She had been slightly ailing for a day or two, but a great accession of weakness suddenly rushed over her like a flood. The Doctor came, looked grave, and prescribed; Jenny grew worse hourly. Between midnight and dawning of the second day, she died. Just before she passed away, holding Abner's hand in her light feather-soft clasp, she whispered word by word, with gasps between: "A—light—in—the—window—for—thee, brother."

Left solitary, the old man pined. A cousin offered to come and stay with him, but he declined, preferring to be alone. The silence was like that of desolation. No Jenny to welcome him when he entered, to see that coat and hat were brushed and everything spick and span when he went out. No little figure going soberly to church and prayer-meeting with a wistful glance at him, as he remained at home.

"Fool that I was, and brute!" he said to himself.

"I might at least have gone with her now and then; given her that pleasure. But I was too selfish, too conceited, too blind. And now, I can never make it up to Jenny. Never, to all eternity! I am a wretch undone!" Abner's heart ached, he groaned and sighed, and walked up and down the floor, lamenting. It did not yet occur to him to pray. But he had begun to repent, and that is the first step. God has a great love waiting for sinners who repent.

The angel who sets down our lives in his book, watched over Abner just then, with such eyes of compassion as only angels have. And one day, I think, the angel smiled, for Abner took up Jenny's Bible, her worn old Bible, and sat down and read it; read it as if it had been a message from the sister who had been his comrade so long, and who had left him to finish the journey by himself.

Abner did not take the Bible with the intention of seeking truth or treasure, but the words on which his eyes first fell, were these:

"Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God. Cry unto Jerusalem that her warfare is accomplished."

Comfort! That was his want! God knew that he was desolate enough! He could not read for tears, but he went to the window and looked out.

Clear in the evening sky, a star shone, bright, golden, glistening! A star that might have been a loophole of the heaven above, where so many of Abner's kindred had gone. Gazing at the star, strangely and suddenly, he never could explain it, a miracle happened to the old and stubborn man. He believed! He did not know how, or why, but light, God's light, flooded his soul. It was a revelation of the Divine, and he felt himself sinful but pardoned, lost but saved, Christ's freedman, as he had been Satan's bondsman.

"Jesus, I yield!" he said, dropping upon his knees, while a great peace like a tidal wave swept over soul and body. Wonderful! Glorious! Unutterable gloriousness! As he rose from that prayer and pledge, he fancied again that he heard the old sister singing softly:

A light in the window for thee, brother,
A light in the window for thee!

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER.

S. S. Lesson for March 10. Mark 10: 17-27. Golden Text Matt.6: 33. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE Lord was in the coasts of Judea, by the farther side of Jordan. There he taught such as resorted unto him. He had corrected the loose and selfish ideas prevalent at that time regarding marriage and divorce, and had given his precious teachings of welcome to the little children. (Mark 10: 12–16.) "As he was going forth on his way there ran one to him, and kneeled to him, and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" Matthew tells us he was a young man. (Matt. 19: 20.) Luke tells us he was a ruler. (Luke 18: 18.) It is quite clear that he was a man of position, and that he was in thorough earnest about his soul. He was too much in earnest to think what impression it might give of him to others that he should be seen running after the teacher of Nazareth whom all the people of his position so despised; and should even, when he could excite remark, kneel to him.

When Nicodemus came as an inquirer, he took the precaution to come by night, when he could not be observed; and he approached the Master with a courteous recognition of his divine commission. But when a man stands face to face with the tremendous facts of eternal life and eternal death, awakened by the Holy Ghost, he loses mastery of himself; the issues are too great to admit of unnecessary words or deeds; he is perishing, he is lost, and must have salvation at any cost. But there is more involved in eternal life than simply salvation in the sense of pardon. Eternal life is himself, the Life manifested in the person of Christ. Eternal life, in its very fulness, is nothing less than that partnership with the divine nature which is pledged to us if we escape the corruption which is in the world through lust; it is the life which God gave his Son authority to give to all those whom he had given to him. Men may preach a mutilated Gospel, and offer a half salvation to man which may bring them to know the pardon of sin without becoming holy and Christlike in their lives, and ready for the coming of their Lord, but Christ himself could not do so. The inquirer came to him as a Jew who knew the law, and Christ met him on his own ground as a Jew. "Good Master," or Teacher, he had said, "what shall I do." or (Matt. 19: 16.) "What good thing shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?" In the first place, the Master deals with his ideas of goodness. The young man wanted to be good and wanted to be great, his idea of eternal life was human nature developed on an ascending scale; his theology left no room for the Cross, for humiliation or nothingness. "Why callest thou me good? None is good save God." It was the first check to his own idea. What! did not even this holy prophet of Nazareth claim to be good? This Man, "who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil," did not even he claim any merit, but attribute all to God? This was something quite new and unknown to the earnest inquirer.

Still dealing with him as a Jew, the Lord continued, "Thou knowest the commandments, or (Matt.19: 17,18) "if thou wouldest enter into life, keep the commandments." To this the young ruler replied by the question, "Which?" And the Master answered by the six commandments in the decalogue which contain the law of love to man. With a clear, but unenlightened conscience, the rich young man answered: "Master, all these have I observed from my youth." But having, as he thought, passed successfully through this examination, he must now pass a higher. From the standard of an outward and ceremonial religiousness, he must come to be tried by him who searcheth the heart, and learn the summing up of all the commandments in the love which is the fulfilling of the law.

"And Jesus, looking upon him, loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go and sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me." (R.V.) It was Like a Thunderbolt.

What! give all? But this would put it forever out of his power to do good according to his ideas of doing it. He was rich, he could give much, he was willing to give liberally, but to give all; this would make him to be nothing and nobody. It would be like asking a merchant to give up all his capital, it would mean certain ruin. Yes, certain ruin; yes, the utter break up of all we are and have; yes, to deny ourselves, to hate our own life; yes, to take the place given us by the death of Christ. "Ye died and your life is hid with Christ in God." This is the only, but certain condition that we may have eternal life. Poor young man, this was too great a cost When he was put to a test, the love for his own position, and the love for his own possessions proved stronger than the love for his neighbor in which he thought he had passed so successfully. His desire for eternal life, which had seemed so deep and real, did not prove under the strong test strong enough to overpower his self-love. He went away sorrowful; all his goodness, all his morality, all his generosity, all his hitherto unblemished past, could not procure eternal life. The Lord wanted more than all that he could give while he retained himself in his own hands. It is not our works, our gifts, our efforts, which the Master seeks that he may communicate his own life to those who have laid down their own lives and all they are and have at his feet. But Oh, how many, even of God's children, have failed to learn this lesson! How many there are who yet value themselves on their earnestness, their work for God, their knowledge of his Word, their gifts for service, their anointing for service or other religious experience, and in their own eyes they are something or sombody for him. They can, as they think, confer something on the Lord, can be, in some measure, God's benefactors. They will relate with satisfaction what they have renounced for his sake, what they have suffered for him, what they have done for him. They have not left all they have and are to follow him. And the Master who watched the retreating form of the disappointed young ruler, said, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" And again, "Children, how hard it is for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!" "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God!"

"ONE THING THOU LACKEST . . SELL WHAT THOU HAST, AND GIVE TO THE POOR"

After all the holy teachings of the Lord which the disciples had received, illustrated by his own unearthly life, the disciples were still almost as much at a loss as the rich young ruler to understand their Lord. "They were astonished exceedingly, saying unto him, Who then can be saved? Jesus looking upon them saith, "With men it is impossible, but not with God, for with God all things are possible" Eternal life is a product, not of human nature: it is impossible that it can proceed from man; it cannot be inherited, as the young man thought; it must be given by him who gave to all men, "Life and breath and all things."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AMONG the most pathetic incidents of the Gospel is that of the lesson. A wealthy young man approaches Christ with a question. It is not one of those intellectual pitfalls that the scribes were accustomed to lay before the Master. The young man wanted help and was evidently sincere. We are told that Christ looking at him, that is reading his heart, loved him. He wants to attain eternal life and he asks Christ what he must do to secure it. He addresses Christ as "Good Master," as he would have addressed any other religious teacher. Christ prefaces his answer with the remark, about which theologians have disputed for centuries: "There is none good but one that is God." No entirely satisfactory explanation has been given of the words, but it would appear that Christ was not so much disclaiming goodness, or implying that all men were bad, as to be directing the young man's thoughts away from human resources to the fountain and source of goodness. A short colloquy, shows that the inquirer has already, in his own opinion at any rate, attained negative goodness He has been reared in a godly home and has not, from his youth upward, broken any of the commandments. But he wants more He is not satisfied with himself and he carries his problem to Jesus in the words "What lack I yet?" With unerring finger, Christ points to one weak place in his character. If he really wants to be perfect, let him sell his property and give the proceeds to the poor and become Christ's disciple The faulty place is at once revealed to the aspirant. That is the one thing he has not the strength to do No longer must he regard himself as on the way to perfection. He knows now that there is a defect in his character, and what that defect is. The demand showed Christ's knowledge of men. He did not make it of Martha, who was surely in comfortable circumstances; nor did he ask Peter to give away his house at Capernaum. Either of the two would have made the sacrifice a word and therefore it was not required of them. It was not the sacrifice that was wanted but the spirit to make the sacrifice. As with Abraham, it was enough when he took the knife to slay his son. Thus all character may be tested. With some, the test may be property, as in this case; with others may be an office; with others a companion with others a habit. If there is one thing of any kind that could not be given up for Christ's sake then we may know where there is a faulty place in Christian character. However much Christ is loved, there is something that is loved better.

Sell whatever thou hast. The young man could not bring himself to let go his possessions even to save his soul. An African traveler says that in Algeria the peasant has a very simple method of catching a monkey. He attaches a gourd firmly to a tree, and in the gourd makes an opening just large enough for the monkey to put his hand through. Inside the gourd are some nuts, rice, or something else that the monkey likes. He goes to the gourd in the night thrusts in his hand and grabs the delicacy But when he attempts to withdraw his hand he cannot do it, for the hand is clenched and he has not the sense to unclench it. He will not let go his booty, and as he cannot move the gourd, he stands there till morning, when he is captured with his prize in his grasp.

Take up the cross. Mr. Simeon, of the English University of Cambridge, was very unpopular in the University in his earlier years because of his conscientious refusal to spend his time in riotous pleasures, and because of his evangelical doctrines. He had no friends, and was ridiculed and reproached on all hands. One day, feeling greatly discouraged, and conscious that his spiritual strength was failing in the storm of opposition, scorn and contumely, he opened his New Testament with an earnest prayer that God would direct his reading to some passage that would help him. His eye lighted on his own name "A man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to bear his cross." He accepted this as a message, and exclaimed "His cross! Ah, rightly glad will I bear I forgot that it was his cross they were compelling me to bear. I need no compulsion From that day he was no more dispirited but bore all reproaches cheerfully.

He had great possessions. He was a ruler too, and his lot was an enviable one. But it would give him no help after death. The Talmud contains an expressive legend which illustrates this. It is to the effect that the guardian angel at the gates of paradise was aroused by a summons. "Who knocks?" demanded the angel. "Alexander," was the reply. "And who is Alexander?" The reply was given in imperial accents, "Alexander—the Alexander—Alexander the Great—the Conqueror of the World." The angel said, "We know him not; this is the Lord's gate; only the righteous enter here."

How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom. Riches have held many a man back from the kingdom to his own destruction. A plant called by botanists "Apocynum Androsæmifolium," is a fatal plant for insects. The fly alights on the nectary of the expanded blossom and finds honey there. He applies his trunk, but the moment the fly touches it and begins to feed the filaments close on the protruded proboscis, and the fly is a prisoner. It struggles desperately, but cannot get away, and dies a lingering death from exhaustion.

For a camel to go through the eye of a needle. A common expression among the Jews to imply something difficult if not impossible. In walled cities there were two gates one a large one for camels and vehicles and the other a small one for foot passengers. The small one was called the Needle's Eye. Lady Duff Gordon writes: "Yesterday while traveling back to Cairo, I saw a camel go through the needle's eye, as the small low archway of the enclosure was called. They made him kneel down, and then they took off his load and all the gaily festooned cloths that decorated the seat on his back. When he was quite stripped he seemed to know what he had to do. He lowered his head and shuffled through on his knees. I thought so must the grand humble themselves to enter the kingdom he Relief Fund a Blessing to the Afflicted West—Distributors Still at Work—Mr. Ludden on the Nebraska Situation—Help still needed in Kansas, Oklahoma and Dakota.

NEARLY two months have passed since the readers of this journal, responsive to the call of suffering humanity and with hearts full of Christian love and sympathy, began to extend aid to the Western ifferers. During those eight weeks a wonerful and blessed work has been accomished. Many thousands of families to-day we it to these kind friends that they have ot perished of cold and starvation, and the alue of Christianity has receive a new ilustration of such splendid magnitude and roductive of such magnificent results that will long be remembered. East and West re united in a stronger bond of love and ratitude than ever before. What a multiplication of blessing has resulted! The origal givers have the blessing promised to hose who give, the distributors have the leasure of relieving suffering, and the poor hemselves are blessed in the gifts. THE HRISTIAN HERALD is thankful to have een the medium in this gracious work.

Meanwhile, the Relief Fund still grows ith every passing day, and is being romptly applied through our Volunteer Distributors as well as through the local elief Committees and other channels in he suffering States. Much yet remains to e done, especially in Kansas, Oklahoma, nd South Dakota. In Nebraska, the Relief Commission states, the situation is more opeful, and in Colorado the distress is being systematically relieved through the fund pened in Denver by the "Republican" ewspaper, the first impetus to which was afrded through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund three weeks ago. As many complaints have been received from Nebraska, tating that the destitution in numerous istricts was still unrelieved, we communiated with Manager Ludden, at Lincoln, on he subject. Mr. Ludden, in reply, telegraphs substantially as follows:

1. The State Relief Commission's scheme of distribution includes all the districts from which such complaints have come.
2. The reports alleging great and unrelieved destitution in those districts are unfounded.
3. If contributions continue as at present, the Commission will be able to afford all the necessary relief until the crisis is past.
4. The Commission will always investigate and, if found worthy, relieve any new applicatis.

Manager Ludden is apparently doing the best that could be done under all the circumstances and, like a wise general, is husbanding a portion of his resources for the emergency that is certain to arrive before the winter is over.

Among the Distributors.

Some of the work done by the distributors, in the course of their labors, has been almost heroic. Clothing, flour and other supplies, consigned to them by the Fund have been hauled many miles from the nearest railroad depot, through blinding storms of snow and hail, and distributed to the needy at points far apart and almost at the risk of death from exposure.

Chairman Geo. H. Hornby, of the Relief Committee of Valentine, writes that 350 families in Cherry County will have to be aided with seed grain. Two hundred destitute applicants have been relieved from supplies received there by the Woman's Relief Corps. H. A. Edgehill, Maywood, writes that the needy at that place are well supplied. Rev. A.W. Graves, Baptist Church, North Platte, who has done good work among the destitute, writes that there are still many needy ones who have not yet been reached.

Among the Volunteer Distributors in Nebraska who have reported progress in relief work for the Fund are these.

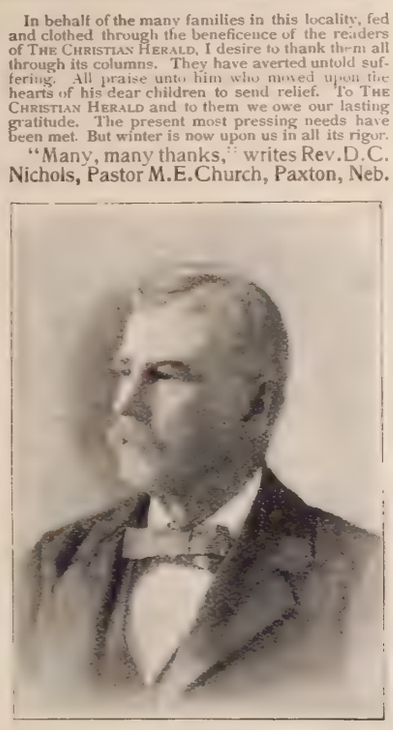
S. A. Hutchinson, Mascot (42 families and 191 individuals relieved); Mrs. Ira McCollister, Berwyn (clothed and otherwise assisted 85 families); J. S. McPherson, Hiawatha (many destitute families aided: liberal supplies received); Mrs. Peter Burmood, Wood River; Mrs. Elmer Adams, Eustis: J. C. Manlick, Broken Bow (all now supplied); W. E. Spottswood, Anselmo; Fred. Urmiller, St. Michael; Mrs. R. D. Carlton, Grand Island; Margaret J. Morrison, Loomis; Mrs. D. E. Dodd, Green; T. J. Hazleton, Bassett (50 families, or about 225 persons helped); A. M. Johnson, Curtis; Bissell Pittsford, Olive; Mrs. John Downer, Elgin; J. S. Wayman, Cambridge; John S. Newberry, Benkleman (5 families relieved).

Many destitute families have been aided with the money ($358.71) and clothing sent to Mrs. O. H. Gordon and Mrs. D. W. Wilson, of Merna, Neb., which these ladies transferred to Mr. A. C. Towle, supervisor of the precinct.

A cheering report is that of Rev. S. H. Day, pastor of the Friend's Church, Pearl, Neb., who writes:

In behalf of the many families in this locality, fed and clothed through the beneficence of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I desire to thank them all through its columns. They have averted untold suffering. All praise unto him who moved upon the hearts of his dear children to send relief. To THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to them we owe our lasting gratitude. The present most pressing needs have been met. But winter is now upon us in all its rigor.

"Many, many thanks," writes Rev. D. C. Nichols, Pastor M.E. Church, Paxton, Neb.



WM. M. NASON OF OMAHA.
President Nebraska State Relief Commission.

"May God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers. I have distributed clothing among thirty-one families. These contributions have brought comfort to many."

C. L. Karnes, Ancelmo, Neb., acknowledges the receipt of clothing from Mrs. E. D. Gross, which has been duly distributed.

The Relief Work in Kansas.

Our Fund distribution in Kansas is progressing with order and rapidity. Rev. G. W. Sharp, who is in charge of the work, writes that the five carloads of clothing and supplies have now been distributed at Almena, Colby, Hill City, Quinter and Beloit. These supplies were in every instance distributed with the aid of local relief committees and gave great satisfaction, being the means of affording warmth and nourishment to many hundreds of needy families. The churches and citizens of Colby, Kan., have forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a letter of grateful acknowledgment of the gift from it readers.

Miss Tressie Addams, a Public School teacher of Portis, Kan., writes in behalf of the people of Twelve-mile Creek, who are destitute of fuel and clothing, and are now going barefooted and clad in grain sacks.

The Woman's Relief Corps of Oberlin, Kan. (Rosella V. Briggs, President), writes:

We have a great many destitute people, who would rather starve than ask for aid; for when they receive it from the Commissioners they have to be classed as paupers. Money for flour will be very acceptable here.

Reports from Western Kansas show that a terrible condition of suffering prevails in many counties; and numbers of families are in danger of death by freezing or starving. Contributions in the form of clothing and supplies are greatly needed.

Praying Over the Gifts.

The Relief Committee of Graham co., Kan., adopted resolutions thanking through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the donors, of the car-load of clothing and provisions delivered at Hill City. Writing of the distribution at Colby, Rev. G. W. Sharp, says:

I met the Relief Committee, had the car unloaded, its contents drayed to a large empty room, organized a force of about fourteen helpers, consisting of the Committee and persons selected by them—clerks, inspectors, box-openers, &c., and we never slept till a general inventory of the whole was taken; every box, barrel, and package being opened, examined, and turned over to the Relief Committee, and receipted for. Like the other cars I have distributed, if contained a splendid supply of clothing for men, women and children, and no small amount of shoes, and bedding, and some provisions. When we closed the door to begin invoicing we united in a short prayer for the guidance and blessing of God in the dispatch of the business, and when the invoicing was finished in the night, and our eyes beheld the immense amount of goods for the many destitute people of Thomas county, who were needing them that cold night, we closed our labor with thanks to our Father in heaven, and having sung "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," we were dismissed with a benediction.

During the week, Rev. A. G. Zigeler, Pastor of the Reformed Church, of Harrison, Douglas county, S. Dak., visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office in New York, and related a most pitiful story of the suffering in his section. Douglas county has a population of forty-five hundred and has had practically no good crops since 1890. Last years was a complete failure. Some aid in the shape of flour and coal has been received; but at least three hundred farmers' families aggregating fifteen hundred persons will require help from now till spring. What is most urgently needed is corn to feed the horses. Fifty bushels per family would meet all requirements. Mr. A. Hazen is Treasurer of the Relief Committee at Harrison.

Among recent notable contributions, is that of many citizens of Stamford, Conn., who have forwarded to the West through Rev. Samuel Scoville of Stamford, many barrels and boxes of clothing and provisions and over $130 in money.

The Fund Still Growing.

Contributions to the Relief Fund during the week were as follows:

Bible House, New York City.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

THE publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided that none of the valuable books offered to our subscribers as Premiums during the past season will be selected for that purpose next season. Our contracts with the various publishers debar us from thus using them after the close of 1895. In view of this decision, and as we have on hand a limited number of volumes of

"The Pathway of Life,"
"From Manger to Throne," and
"Gospel Hymns Nos. 1 to 6," we desire to distribute this surplus among our subscribers on the following condition:

For every new Premium subscription at $2 we will send any two premiums of your own selection, to the same or separate addresses, all charges prepaid. One book goes with the subscription as a Premium, and the other book goes to the person sending in the subscription. It should be distinctly understood that the subscription which is sent in under this exceptional proposition must be a NEW one, and it must be stated in the letter accompanying it that such subscription is not intended to take the place of some other subscription about to expire.

To many thousands of our readers, the beauty and value of these three magnificent volumes are already well known. They have, within a brief space of time, secured a world-wide celebrity, and it is because we believe that, next to the Bible itself, they are the books that will be most highly appreciated in every moral, well-conducted, Christian home that we are prompted to make this most unusual offer in behalf of those subscribers who wish to secure, both for themselves and their friends, some of these beautiful volumes. "The Pathway of Life," Rev. Dr. Talmage's great work, is a large, finely bound and splendidly illustrated book of 544 pages, replete with the finest and ablest productions of his magic pen. "From Manger to Throne," is a handsome volume of 544 pages, copiously and expensively illustrated and in superior binding; it is, beyond all others, the one simple, eloquent and thrilling story that has ever appeared (outside of the Evangelists' pages), of the Master's earthly sojourn. The "Gospel Hymns No. 1 to 6," is a perfect treasury of 729 of the best and sweetest sacred songs for the Church, the Sunday School and the home, with every hymn in large type set to music, and is adapted to every Christian denomination.

All who have not yet been so fortunate as to secure at least one of these valuable books, should take this opportunity, which will hold good only as long as our supply will hold out.

SLIPPERY PLACES.

ON a recent Sabbath, we had an opportunity of finding out just what the old Bible writers meant by slippery places. In those warmer climates they may never have seen a sheet of frozen rain covering the earth, as we on the occasion aforesaid saw; but they might have had a general idea of it. As the audiences that day adjourned, some went flat down, some fell head foremost, some sat gracefully down; but the more part struck out indefinitely, and swung round, and slipped about, and caught after things. Neither sliding nor skating seems appropriate on your way from church, but there was nothing else to do. Walking was abolished. Elders, deacons, and clergymen, after singing the doxology, took to field sports, one good man, of undoubted sobriety, getting down into the gutter as though he intended to stay there. A modest woman, without introduction, threw her arms around a lamp-post as though it were a friend from whom she had been parted for fifteen years. A sedate and inoffensive man went round like an unmanageable ship at sea, and ran the boom of his umbrella into a lady's head-rigging. Tides of travel from different churches met each other, unable to stop: Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and Pedo-baptists, who had been quarreling for some time, suddenly and convulsively embracing each other. It seemed to us incongruous that so many people should have taken their prayer-books along with them when they went a-sliding.

We thought how easy it is to sit in church and sing "Rock of Ages," and preach about duty and heaven, not realizing that there is a cold, slippery world waiting for us outside. The tug and strain and self-poising comes after the doxology. First the benediction, then the ice. That is the reason so many who pray and sing and preach splendidly go down as soon as they get out of doors. They imagine it is going to be Antioch, and Mount Pisgah, and Coronation all the way. The reason that so many good men fall, is because they do not take heed to their steps. David seems to feel his feet going from under him on an uneven cake of ice when he cries out, "My steps had well nigh slipt."

But alas for those who have nothing to hold on to as they pass on their way! Their feet will slide in due time. The pond of sin is smoothly frozen over, and they venture on it only to fall through; and the litany to be chanted over their demise, as the most appropriate, is Psalm 73: 18: "Surely thou didst set them in slippery places; thou causedst them down into destruction."

We noticed, however, on the icy day spoken of, that many who slipped did not fall. There was some one's arm to take hold of just in time to prevent a serious casualty. Because a Christian makes a bad slip do not conclude that he has fallen. Laying hold of an arm omnipotent, he may recover himself and get safely through. But it is a fortunate thing, if Christians must fall at all, that they fall on their way toward home, as was the case with hundreds of people on the glazed pavements of that Sabbath.

HELPING PEOPLE OUT.

THE story of how Jeremiah got out of the dungeon you may not fully understand. He had sunk in the mire well up toward his neck. There was a black man by the name of Ebed-melech, who went to the king and pleaded for the deliverance of Jeremiah. Having obtained the king's permission, Ebed-melech with others went to lift the prophet out. No door was to be opened, but the prophet is to be raised bodily out of the pit. Ebed-melech knows that a rope around the prophet's body will hurt him without some padding placed under the rope. Ebed-melech finds, under the "safe," in the palace, a few rags that he takes with him to the pit, and throws them in. Jeremiah puts these rags under his arms, then fastens the rope around his own body, and Ebed-melech begins the work of rescue.

Now we may not literally have ever been incarcerated, but who has never by reason of spiritual depression been cast into a dungeon. Depressed physical health sometimes does this work. Overwork or indigestion has left some of you in the mire. You think God has forsaken you, and your title to heaven has been forfeited, and everything looks dark. My friend, you want a dose of medicine, or a few days' rest. We think as soon as your body gets right your soul will be right. But we cannot tell what put you in the dungeon. We simply know that some of you are there. We would rather take the place of Ebed-melech, and try to pull you out.

Notice how kindly and gently that man helped Jeremiah. He did not jerk him out, or lift him by the hair of the head, but, having provided rags for the arm-pits, he gently and carefully hoisted him. In like manner let us lift up the depressed brother that may be in the mire. Let us all lay hold and give him a lift.

One of the chief works of the Church is to imitate Ebed-melech in hoisting good people out of the dungeon. Do not be rough with them. Do not scold them. All sarcasm in such cases is out of place. Do not bruise the man with a harsh rope. You will be in the dungeon yourself some time, and will know the worth of gentleness. O, for more sympathy among Christians, for a multiplication of Ebed-melechs! Let us bear each other's burdens, soothe each other's sorrows, open each other's dungeons. The Church needs not so much "sons of thunder" as "sons of consolation."

STALWART WORKERS.

THE Bible clergy had muscle as well as grace. David was little, but too mighty for Goliath, and grand on a bear hunt. People talk of Paul as though he were a skeleton, because he had a thorn in the flesh, but he was no skeleton. He rode horseback and graduated from the saddle into the ministry. He did not fall from his horse because he was not a good rider. From the joyful view he took of almost everything I know nothing ailed his liver. From the courageous way he stood before Felix, I know nothing was the matter with his backbone. At sixty-eight years of age he made a journey of more than fifteen hundred miles, before palace cars were invented, and still had enough strength left to write in a dungeon the Second Epistle to Timothy. Not much skeleton about that! Christian workers need to be strong, robust, agile and stalwart. Before the lamb and lion lie down together there will be more fighting done, and I want our side to win.

Nothing pleases us more than to see each denomination do its own work in its own way. That is an absurd proposition often made that all denominations should be combined in one. Some people are born Episcopalians, and some are born Methodists, and some are born Presbyterians, and we all have natural affinity toward certain forms of Church government or some style of religious theory. Each denomination has a truth, or a part of a truth, but no denomination has all the truth. You go into a watch factory and you see a great many men busy. They are all making watches, and yet they are all busy with different parts of the watch. These men are stirring the blaze, these men are fastening the rivets, these are fashioning the wheels or the springs or the case. But when these twenty or thirty or forty hands have each completed what they had to do and the watch is wound up, it is the timepiece that forgets not to mark the hours while we work and sleep. Now, the reconstruction of this world for Christ is to be at the command of all denominations of Christians—each one doing its particular work.

The following additional names have been received for the Correspondence Society for mutual spiritual benefit, proposed by "Reader," Canada:

Ethel Sinsapaugh, Sangerties, N. Y., writes:

Have I, in simple faith
Before thy gracious throne,
Lived only in thy strength,
Nor trusted in my own?

Dear Saviour, guide my feet
In all the toilsome way,
And bring me nearer thee
With each declining day.

R. T. Priddy, Decatur, Ill. In what part of the Bible is it stated that we are to be judged by the deeds done in the body?

See Luke 23: 41; Rom. 2: 6; Rev. 20: 13.

S. J. Muller, Waterbury, Conn. Who was St. Valentine, after whom the 14th of February is named St. Valentine's Day?

A priest or monk of the early Church who is said to have suffered martyrdom in the third century, having been beheaded in Rome on the day which has been set apart to his memory. The custom of sending valentines on that day had no connection with the martyr, being a survival of a peculiar usage connected with the heathen feasts of ancient Rome, known as the "Lupercalia."

E. Starrett, Newark, N. J. A friend quoted to me a few days ago, a verse from an old poem, entitle: "The sermon to the Fishes." Can you supply the verse?

You probably refer to these lines:

The sermon now ended,
Each turned and descended;
The pikes went on stealing,
The eels went on eeling;
Much delighted were they,
But preferred the old way.

The moral is aimed at those people who have the form of religion without the spirit and who, after hearing the Word, forget all about it and return to their evil ways.

"Anxious Soul," Bickle, Mo. 1. Is it possible for an unrepentant soul to come to Christ and be saved? 2. Are the Christian friends of such a person justified in praying for his salvation?

1. The very fact of going to Christ for salvation implies repentance. It argues sorrow for past sin and a desire for holiness. Christ nowhere demands the agony and distress that some experience before conversion. Many truly converted persons never suffer in that way and there is no merit in such experiences. But there should be a desire to quit sin and a sincere hatred of it, and that often comes after conversion instead of before. The man who has been saved without previously suffering the pangs which often accompany conviction generally feels afterward a horror of doing anything that would grieve his Lord and sincere sorrow for ever having done so. The essential thing is to quit sinning, and the strength for that comes from Christ after conversion. 2. Certainly they are justified, and it is their duty to do so.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

IN A JAPANESE TEA-HOUSE.

THE picture on this page is from a photograph secured by Rev. Satori Kato of a familiar scene in Japan. It represents a Japanese house of entertainment corresponding with our hotels, which is called "tea-house." An American traveller in Japan who, during his wanderings in the country spent most of the nights in these tea-houses, gives an interesting account of his entertainment. He says that at first sight the fine roomy house surrounded with its extensive tea-garden gives the impression of quiet, reposeful seclusion, which is not realized on further acquaintance. It is quiet before five o'clock in the evening, but about that time there is an influx of guests. Each is provided with the inevitable tea, and then discards his travelling or working dress and proceeds to bathe in water as hot as he can bear it, talking to his companions meanwhile in the high tones required to reach them over the partitions of their respective rooms. The bathing occupies a long time, and when it is over, each guest puts on the clean white garment resembling a dressing-gown, provided by the keeper of the tea-house, and adjourns to the common room where he has dinner or supper, as he may choose to call the substantial meal that is served there. They talk loudly over the meal, and there is more talking and laughing afterward, as they sit and smoke till midnight. Then they retire, and there is snoring till five o'clock which is the usual hour for rising. There is more loud talking during dressing and breakfast, until by seven o'clock the last guest has departed. Then an army of bright little servant girls has possession of the place, and there is a noise of thorough and most conscientious cleaning going on with the clatter of their apparatus and the playful badinage of the sweepers and dusters. All this keeps a light sleeper awake, as the thin sliding partitions which separate the rooms at night would be little bar to sound, even if they reached to the top of the room and above them is generally a foot or so of open wood-word intended to secure ventilation and afford convenience for conversation between the occupants of adjoining rooms. The cleaning goes on until everything is spick and span throughout the house and then comes the only real quiet until five o'clock, when the guests begin to arrive again and the same series of noises must be endured. There is probably some touch of exaggeration in the picture and it is likely that in any case the description does not apply to all the tea-houses; and as an offset to the inconveniences, the traveller mentions the uniform politeness, civility, moderation in charges and extreme cleanliness everywhere found. These are no slight advantages and, as it is in other lands beside Japan, and in every lot, the agreeable has to be taken into account as well as the disagreeable. Everyone would be the happier for doing so, but too often the good in life is overlooked and only the misery is realized. He is the happy man who like the Apostle has been in the school of Christ and can say as he did, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." (Phil. 4: 11.)

The Castaway's Brother.

Among the passengers who landed in New York on Feb. 10 from the "Umbria" were fourteen shipwrecked French sailors whom the captain of the English steamer had rescued from the rigging of a water-logged vessel in mid-ocean. It was a French ship on the return voyage from Halifax, N. S. She was loaded with lumber, which kept her afloat, but her deck was level with the water, and the crew had been many hours in the rigging. The "Umbria" passed her in the night without seeing her, but the men could see the "Umbria," as being a passenger ship, there were many lights illuminating her. They gave the usual signal of distress, which is three torches held one above the other, by men in the rigging of the ship in distress. The "Umbria" at once sent a boat to their relief and brought them all safely to New York. One of the men said he had a brother in New York whom he had not seen or heard from since they parted in Bordeaux more than fourteen years ago. He did not know his brother's address, but had heard that he was somewhere in the city. By the aid of a directory and some searching, a man of the right name was found and brought to the boarding-house where the castaway was staying. The two men bore a close resemblance to each other, and each recognized the other at once. The castaway was warmly greeted and carried off to his brother's home to make the acquaintance of his sister-in-law and the nephews and nieces he had never seen. A man who had allowed fourteen years to pass without communicating with his brother might have naturally had some doubts about being welcomed in his destitute condition; but if he had, they were speedily removed. It is so with people who having neglected Christ, are driven by some affliction to seek him. They are welcomed without any reproaches from him; although there are often many they make against themselves. (1 Timothy 1: 13.)

Reading a Palimpsest.

An ingenious application of photography to the solution of a literary problem is described in a scientific journal. The problem consists in reading the earlier writing on a parchment after it has been partially obliterated and other writing put upon it. There are many such manuscripts, which are called palimpsests, among ancient documents. The price of parchment in early times being heavy, a poor scholar would wash off all he could of the writing on a parchment and would then inscribe what he wished to write between the lines of the earlier writing. It generally happens that the later writing is worthless compared with the earlier one, but modern scholars who want to read the earlier work find it very difficult to do so. The method adopted is to take a photograph of the manuscript through a yellow screen. The result is a negative in which the early yellowish writing is barely distinguishable and the later and blacker writing appears in white letters. Next an ordinary photograph is taken in which both writings show in their natural colors, but mixed together. By putting the first photograph on the top of the other, the later writing disappears as the white letters exactly cover its black letters. It is then easy to read the early writing without being confused by the later. Our modern sceptics and cavillers at the Bible might advantageously use an analogous mental process in studying its sacred pages. Their objections are always based on parts of the Book which were local, temporary and personal, like the Levitical law and figurative Oriental imagery. These confuse them and prevent their reading the message of God which the Book contains. (Titus 3: 9.)

A Shocking Bargain.

A physician of Buffalo, N. Y., in giving some reminiscences of his practice recently, told of an extraordinary offer that was made to him some time ago. He says that a German came to his office and without speaking placed in his hand a paper on which was written: "This man wants to know if he can sell his body. Would like to know how much his children would receive after his death. He is a poor man and would be glad to have fifty dollars in advance. He does not speak English well so please write answer which will be translated to him." The physician was shocked at such a proposal and addressing the man in his own language asked what it meant. In reply he heard a story of terrible destitution, of futile efforts to obtain work and of the unendurable agony of hearing his three little children cry for food which he could not give them. He wanted to kill himself, he said, to end his misery, but he wanted his children to benefit by his death, so he had conceived the scheme of selling his body, if he could get some surgeon or college to buy it. The doctor expostulated with him, and finding that the man was willing and anxious to work, took care that he had no need to repeat his horrible offer to anyone else. The good doctor said it gave him a shock to think that a man in his own city could be in extremities so dire as to coolly propose such a dreadful bargain. Unhappily, people are not so much shocked when they hear of anyone selling their soul for gain. That bargain is often made, and the saddest feature of it is that the soul is sold, as tradesman say about their goods, "regardless of cost," for the redemption of the soul cost the Son of God suffering and death. (1 Peter 1: 18.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Our Publisher's Announcement on the opposite page will meet the wishes of a very large number of readers who have longed for an opportunity to secure one of our splendid book premiums. All should take advantage of the offer while the supply lasts.

Mr. Geo. M. Pullman, of Palace Car Fame, has erected a handsome church as a memorial to his father at Albion, N. Y. It will be used by the Universalist denomination.

A Hungarian Editor who Died recently in New York was denied burial in the Roman Catholic cemetery, although a devout member of the church. The reason assigned was that he did not receive extreme unction before his death. His widow protested that her husband had no apprehension that his illness would have a fatal termination, but the explanation was not considered sufficient.

Rev. John McNeill, whose Evangelistic Services in South Africa and Australia have started revivals in both lands, has received an invitation from churches of several denominations in India urging him to labor there for as long a period as he can spare. It is understood that Mr. McNeill will accept, and already preparatory prayer meetings have been commenced in Calcutta. The success attending Mr. McNeill's labors wherever he has gone is truly marvellous.

A Roman Catholic Priest Officiating Recently at the funeral of a young member of his flock who had been murdered, notified all present that he should require from every one in his congregation a promise not to carry concealed weapons. Any one refusing to give such a promise would be denied the sacraments of the church. If other priests will take the same stand there will be not near so many murders in our large cities. The Italian habit of carrying a stiletto has led to many violent deaths.

Count Ignatieff, the Most inveterate Persecutor of the Russian Stundists, is to be removed from the governorship of the three provinces in which his cruel work has been done. The young Czar has caused it to be known that he will not sanction hostile measures against either the Stundists or the Jews.

Rev. Dr. Talmage will preach a sermon on Thursday evening, March 21st, to the Christian Workers' Convention, which will assemble in Rev. Dr. Russell H. Conwell's church, "The Temple," in Philadelphia. Rev. Dr. Talmage has also consented to preach at the Ocean Grove Auditorium on "Camp-Meeting Sunday," Aug. 25 next.

The Congregational Church of Westfield, N. J., recently started a subscription to present a testimonial to Rev. C. H. Patton, its pastor, who was removing to another charge. Mr. Patton asked that the testimonial take the form of a contribution to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The result was an addition of $500 to the Board's treasury.

A Great Religious Revival is in progress at Portland, Ind. Meetings had been held in the M. E. Church for four weeks without a single conversion. On Monday of the fifth week six souls were brought in and during the following week over two hundred accepted Christ. Rev. T. C. Reade, D.D., Principal of Taylor University, has been actively aiding in the work at Portland.

The Death of Mr. J. Ward Childs, Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, New York, which occurred on Feb. 14, removes one of the most earnest and successful mission workers of the city. Mr. Childs was devoted to his work, and had been the means of rescuing many dissipated and hopeless men. His portrait and a sketch of his life appear on another page.

Evangelist Elliott Has Been Conducting Successful revival meetings at Canastola, N. Y. The Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian Churches united. Although the weather was unusually stormy, the attendance was so large that the school-rooms as well as the churches were filled. The Canastola Journal says that the results are extraordinary. Not only have a large number of cards been signed by inquirers, but Christian people have been stirred up and united in Christian work.

A Delightful Entertainment will be Given at Hardman Hall on Fifth Avenue and 19th Street, New York, on March 2nd at 8-15 P. M., for the benefit of Martha's Rest, the home for self-supporting women which is shortly to be opened at Saratoga Springs. The object is to secure a fund by which women who through illness or lack of employment are unable to pay for a vacation may be admitted free. Among the singers who have promised their services are: Miss Elizabeth Paterson, soprano; Miss Antonia H. Sawyer, contralto; and Mr. J. H. McKinley, tenor. Tickets may be obtained at 21 Bible House, New York.

The Chautauqua Assembly Management Announces among its lecturers for the season of 1895, Principal A. M. Fairbairn of Mansfield College, Oxford, England; President G. Stanley Hall of Clark University, Mo.; Mr. John Fish, Cambridge, Mass.; Dr. John Barrows of Chicago; Senator J. B. Gordon of Georgia; President Wm. R. Harper of the University of Chicago; Prof. Borden P. Bowne; Chancellor Henry M. MacCracken and Dr. Wayland Hoyt. The chief topic for the year will be American history and institutions, including all phases of national life. As usual attention will be given to current social questions. The American School of Christian Philosophy will again hold its annual session at Chautauqua, July 2-9 inclusive.

A VOICE IN THE SLUMS.

John Jaeger, Rescued from Drunkenness and Misery, now Working in his Own Way, at the "Mission of Living Waters," to Rescue Others.

ONE of the rival schools of medicine is based on the cardinal principle that "like cures like." The principle has another application in the character of a work being done in a queer old building on the east side of New York City. It is the effort of an uneducated, untrained man to reach with Gospel influences men like himself. The building is in rather an unsavory neighborhood. It is down in Chrystie street, where dirt of all kinds seems to attach to everything. Dirt is in the roadway, on the walls, doors and windows of the houses, and on the faces, hands and clothof an unusual proportion of the people who throng the sidewalks. Truly a dreary, disheartening kind of spectacle does the street present through the greater part of its length, and its worst features seem to intensify and culminate in the block on which the building referred to is located. Saloons abound, thriving on the misery they help to produce. This building is of the regular saloon type, and indeed that was the business carried on in it for many years, but it has cleaned and brightened up, and is now a little oasis of decency in the midst of the desert of filth. Inside, conspicuous on the little raised dais at the farther end, is the familiar stand, the like of which may be seen in any of the saloons around, supporting the beer keg; but in this place it supports a big Bible. In the daytime the place is quiet unlike its neighbors which still stick to the old business, but at night, like them, it takes on life. Old habitues drop in and they bring their associates and have a good time. Anything of a religious character that could be less like a decorous church of the Fifth avenue type, could not be imagined. There is no order of service, and the audience is encouraged to make remarks, or ask questions, or state facts of a private and personal nature. How a staid Presbyterian, accustomed to the solemn, orderly conduct of public worship, would feel there, we cannot imagine, for even an ardent Methodist would probably be astonished, not to say shocked by the things he would see and hear. But he would rejoice at the results. John Jaeger, the leader, has named the place, "The Mission of the Living Waters," and many a thirsty soul has learned the meaning of the name there. The shouts and songs that make the old walls ring, and cause the passers-by to stop and wonder, are evoked by Jaeger's announcing that some miserable, rum-soaked, ragged member of the audience has been persuaded to drink deep of those "living waters." He may not realize yet what the result will be, but Jaeger knows, and so do the people around him, who have drunk there themselves and they know there is reason for rejoicing. They sing and give praises, and pray and sing again, until the cause of it all wonders that they take so much interest in one so worthless as he knows himself to be, and is not a little doubtful as to the permanence of the change they are so glad about. But Jaeger is enthusiastic and sanguine, and he does not estimate the value of a soul by the dilapidated body it lives in, or by the value of the rags that cover the body. He has unbounded faith in the living waters, and with strong, voluble emphasis he assures the trembling convert that Christ will make a man of him, and keep him safe from his enemies.

How the Mission of the Living Waters came to be established Jaeger tells in forcible language; and his wife, a woman of strong common sense and a native shrewdness all her own, gives point to the story. Jaeger's enthusiasm often carries him away and as he is a strong believer in the miraculous and the immanence of God in the affairs of men, he is apt to draw on his imagination, but is brought up by his wife with a round turn and a conscientious statement of bare fact, which ruthlessly prunes away the supernatural adornments with which Jaeger loves to embellish his story. Briefly, it appears that Jaeger is fifty-two years old, a native of Frankfort, in Germany, but has been in this country twenty-seven years. He was a Roman Catholic, but with an extensive [illegible] Jaeger intimates that his profession of any religion at all was the thinnest kind of pretence. He was just a rough, careless, drinking man, a butcher and afterward a truckman by trade, and a worthless kind of ne'er-do-well, who was always in some kind of scrape, needing to be forgiven and set on his feet again.

One day in 1881 Jaeger was just in the stale, miserable condition of a man emerging from a prolonged debauch, with his arm bandaged up, having been cut in some way that Jaeger could not clearly understand. He was not in a condition to receive visitors, and his wife was ashamed to have any one see him. But a visitor came. He was the Sunday School teacher in whose class, at the Camp Memorial Church, Jaeger's children were. He came to look after his pupils, who had been absent while their father had, in the colloquial of the neighborhood, "been cutting up." The family apartments were not extensive and the visitor could not be kept from seeing the head of the family. He condoled with him on his wounded arm and Mrs. Jaeger, with the natural disgust of a woman at consolation being wasted on a man who had only himself to thank for his misfortune, bluntly told the teacher that drink was the cause of the wound. Jaeger did not deny it and with all the sincerity of a man in the trying path from drunk to sober, said he wished he could get quit of the liquor. "All right," said the teacher, "you come with me to-night and I'll take you to a man who will show you how you can do it." Jaeger was incredulous, for he had often tried and failed, but he agreed to go. The teacher took him to Jerry McAuley's Mission in Water street and introduced him. Jerry knew all the symptoms; it was a case just in his line and he proceeded to deal with it in the way that had proved efficacious in so many similar cases. "German man," said Jerry, "kneel down and pray." "I don't know how," said Jaeger. "Well say, 'Jesus save me,' and say it over and over." Jaeger did as he was told and Jerry prayed with him and the teacher joined. It was no use explaining "the plan of salvation," or the doctrines of theology to such a man. Jerry knew that, so he took him straight to Jesus. Jaeger was down in the Water Street Mission till a late hour, but when he came away he felt himself to be a new man.

The next day Jaeger went to work. His wife had listened to his story, and his assurance that he was a changed man, and did not believe it. She had had a disappointing experience of her husband's promises of amendment. His mother, who lived in the city, heard the story, too, and she did not believe. The men who worked with him were incredulous and told him to have a drink and forget all about it. But Jaeger felt a strong conviction that this was a different thing from anything that had come into his life before and he held firm. As time passed, all who knew him began to wonder. Jaeger would not touch the drink, his hands trembled, he was "broken up," but he would not mend himself with the old remedy. At night he would go down to Water street and get fresh strength, and in the daytime he would speak about the change in him to anyone who would listen to him. He insisted on his wife going with him to the meetings and did not rest until she, too, had testified to Christ's saving power.

Chrystie street and its vicinity had known Jaeger for years. He had lived there, worked there, gambled and got drunk there and every one around knew him. He did not want to leave it now, although he had bought his own truck and could afford a better location. He wanted to talk with his old associates and get them to follow his example. He succeeded with so many, that his Christian friends encouraged him to give more time to the work. A position as janitor of a mission was secured for him and he had more time to spend in looking after the lost souls around him. After a time some friends in the Old John Street Noon Meetings helped him to do missionary work and eventually a few of them had him out to Montclair N. J. where they lived, and heard him talk for themselves. They gave him the desire of his heart. This was to hire the old saloon in Chrystie street in which he was wont to carouse, and turn it into a mission. The first month's rent was paid and about a year ago the place was opened. In some way or other, Jaeger insists through the direct interposition of the Lord, the rent has been paid ever since and the meetings held every night. Jaeger lives on the upper story with his wife and family and he has not starved. Sometimes they have had but a loaf of bread and a little tea in the house, and very often they have not had a cent of money, but the food has never quite given out. Some of the friends who knew what kind of work was being done there, would be sure to recollect that the worker needed to be fed and would send the means, and so in faith the mission has stood and is still giving its light like a beacon over the waste of waters of the sinful neighborhood.

A MEETING IN THE "MISSION OF THE LIVING WATERS," CHRYSTIE STREET, NEW YORK.

DRAWN TO CHRIST BY A HYMN.

REV. DUNCAN MATHESON, the well-known Scotch Evangelist, did much both for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the soldiers during the time of the Crimean war. One night, as he was returning from before Sebastopol to his comfortless hut at Balaklava and wading almost ankle deep in the mud, he lifted his eyes to the bright calm stars overhead, and, his soul soaring beyond them, he cheered his toilsome way by singing:

> How bright those glorious spirits shine!
> Whence all their bright array?
> How came they to the blissful seats
> Of everlasting day?
> Lo! these are they from suffering great
> Who came to realms of light,
> And in the blood of Christ have washed
> Their robes which shine so bright.

Next day he fell in with a soldier whose clothing was meagre, tattered, and muddy and whose toes stuck out at the sides of his worn-out shoes. Mr. Matheson asked how he was getting on. The soldier replied that he was much better than he was yesterday. This excited Mr. Matheson's curiosity and he pressed him to tell why he was excessively wretched yesterday, which he did with some reluctance. "As I thought," said the soldier, "of all we have passed through since we came out here to the Crimea, I was miserable. Death seemed preferable to life, and I resolved I would kill myself. I took up my musket, and went down there about seven o'clock last night and was making ready to dispatch myself, when a person I could not distinguish in the darkness passed near me, apparently in a happy mood of mind for he was singing:

> How bright these glorious spirits shine!

to a tune with which I was familiar: and said to myself, 'Well now, that man's circumstances are, no doubt, as bad as mine and yet he seems to be happy,' but on listening to the words he was singing, thought he must be in possession of a source of happiness and have a something to support him, to which I was a stranger. I wished I only knew how to be as happy as he was, and with that I put my musket under my arm and returned. And I feel better to-day and more resolved to bear the worst."

Great was his surpise to be told that the singer who had charmed away the evil spirit of yesterday was now before him. Mr. Matheson told him that it was Christ who was the source of his happiness, and related to him the story of the Cross, and had every reason to believe that this soldier gave himself to the Saviour.

TWENTY YEARS HENCE.

A temperance lecturer was preaching on his favorite theme. "Now, boys, when I ask you a question, you must not be afraid to speak up and answer me. When you look around and see all these fine houses, farms, and cattle, do you ever think who owns them all now? Your fathers own them, do they not?" "Yes, sir," shouted a hundred voices. "Where will your fathers be in twenty years?" "Dead," shouted the urchins. "Right. Now tell me, did you ever in going along the street, notice the drunkard lounging around the public house door, waiting for someone to treat them?" "Yes, sir; lots of them?" "Well, where will they be in twenty years from now?" "Dead," exclaimed the boys. "And who will be drunkard then?" "Us boys."

Everybody was thunderstruck. It was an awful object lesson for those present.

THE BLISS OF LITTLE THINGS.

> If any little word of mine
> May make a life the brighter,
> If any little song of mine
> May make a heart the lighter,
> God help me speak the little word,
> And take my bit of singing
> And drop it in some lonely vale,
> To set the echoes ringing!
> If any little love of mine
> May make a life the sweeter,
> If any little care of mine
> May make a friend's the fleeter,
> If any lift of mine may ease
> The burden of another,
> God give me love, and care, and strength
> To help my toiling brother!

GRACE J. FRANCES. HUBERT P. MAIN.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIFE.

BEGIN the day with God,
Kneel down to him in prayer,
Lift up thy heart to his abode
And seek his grace to share.

Open the book of God
And read a portion there,
That it may hallow all thy thoughts
And sweeten all thy care.

Converse in mind with God,
Thy spirit heavenward raise;
Acknowledge every good bestowed,
And offer grateful praise.

Conclude the day with God,
Thy sins to him confess,
Trust in the Lord's atoning blood,
And plead his righteousness.

Lie down at night with God,
Who gives his servant sleep,
And when thou'rt in the vale of death
He will thee guide and keep.

—MARY A. PORTER.

THE CROSS.

THE Cross to those who are ashamed
A Cross of shame shall be;
To those who love the Cross, it is
As a life-giving tree.

To those who shun the Cross, it is
A heavy load to bear;
While those shall find, who take the Cross,
It takes from them their care.

To those who love the Cross, it is
As Jacob's ladder fair;
They mount to heaven upon the Cross,
And find their Saviour there.

IN QUEST OF A BIBLE.

A LADY who was recently stricken down with a critical illness in a town in France describes in a letter to an English journal her search for a Bible. She wanted to read for herself in God's own word the way of salvation and as she was among Catholics she asked for a Catholic Bible. The nun who nursed her did not possess one, but undertook to borrow one. Inquiry was made of the mistress of the house, who sent up word that she had a Bible and would lend it to the sick lady. "So," says the invalid, "the book was brought to my bedside. I opened it eagerly and the first words that met my eyes on the title-page were, 'History of the Bible.' It was no Bible at all, but an account of some of the contents of the Bible.

"But there was a young abbe in the house just about to take priest's orders, qualifying to be a missionary priest in America. He, too, had heard of my wish for a Catholic Bible, and sent a message to say that if I wished to see one he could get it for me from the house of the parish priest. Of course his offer was gladly accepted. Then followed a further delay of some days, and then the request what part of the Bible I would like to read, as the Bible at the parish priest's house was in thirty-two volumes.

"At last two bulky volumes were brought me, containing the Epistles of St. Paul—and what besides? The margin of each page contained the Vulgate of St. Jerome, a fair translation in Latin from the original languages. But the text itself was a garbled rendering into French, introducing Catholic doctrines and expressions which existed neither in St. Jerome's Vulgate nor in the original. And these doctrines were further enforced by a commentary, which was interspersed with the (so-called) translation. This, then, was the only Bible to be obtained in a highly religious Catholic place.

"On writing to to the British and Foreign Bible Society, which has a depot at Paris, it supplied us with a French translation, which had once been allowed as a Catholic Bible. But the Pope finally vetoed it.

The Catholics themselves prefer to leave all questions about their souls to the priests. It saves trouble. Even in America where many priests encourage their people to read the Bible they will not do it. They regard the priests as responsible for these matters.

THE TRANSLATION.

The Sudden Removal of Watchful Christians to Meet the Lord at His Coming.

BY REV. G. H. PEMBER, M.A.*

THE world will one day be surprised by the sudden and unaccountable disappearance of many persons in the midst of their ordinary occupations. Two men will be working in the field in the middle of the day: one will instantaneously vanish; his bewildered comrade may still see upon the ground the garment which had been put off for labor, but the man will be gone. Two women will be grinding the daily supply of corn in early morning; the hand of one will fail: her companion will look up and see that she is no longer in her place. Two persons will be in the same bed at night: one will be taken away, and the other will awake to solitude and bereavement. (Matt. 24: 40, 41; Luke 17: 34.) As soon as this sign is given, then woe for the earth and the sea! Those who shall be accounted worthy to escape will have been removed from the world: the holy spirit will no longer restrain the mystery of lawlessness; nor will the final judgment of God be delayed.

With regard to the meaning of the words, "one shall be taken," an error has sometimes been made through ignorance of the original. Comparing the clause with that of the thirty-ninth verse, "the flood came and took them all away," some have interpreted, "the one shall be taken away in judgment, the other shall be spared in mercy." But an examination of the Greek immediately dissipates this idea. In the thirty-ninth verse the verb means to "take away by destruction." But in the fortieth and forty-first verses, we find a very different word, which properly signifies "to receive," or, "take alongside," and then, sometimes, "to take with one as a companion."

Thus the word is most appropriately used of those who shall be caught up to Christ, that they may walk with him in white, that they may follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. The same word is used in Matthew 17:1, where we are told that the Lord "taketh," Peter, James, and John, as his companions to the Mount of Transfiguration. He selects three out of the twelve disciples to behold his glory; while the nine are, in the meantime, left at the bottom of the hill to struggle hopelessly with satan, in the person of the demoniac youth; and, consequently to be subjected to the scorn of the world, until at length the Master is seen descending the hill in company with those whom he has taken with him.

Surely this scene is typical, and confirms the interpretation of the passage we are considering, that the one is taken to be a companion of the Lord and to see his glory, while the other is left to agonize with the world and Satan as a further discipline: for the admonition to watch in the next verse seems to imply that both of the two parties are disciples.

Having thus described the sign of his presence, the Lord proceeds to urge upon his followers the necessity of watching, and intimates, by the parable of the householder and the thief, that grievous loss will be sustained by those who neglect his directions. Many other such warnings may be found in the Scriptures, and the special object of watching is plainly set forth in the Lord's own exhortation, uttered just after he had been portraying the terrors of the last week of seven years that closes this dispensation: "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."

These words certainly intimate that a Christian, though sure of eternal life, is not sure of being removed before the commencement of the final Great Tribulation. This favor will be granted only to those who have progressed in holiness, only to those who have been so strengthened with might in the inner man that they have been able to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Such a growth in grace may, indeed, be attained by all believers: the power of prayer and watching is given to every man at his conversion; but he must be willing to deny himself, to take up his cross, and to follow his Master. Then there will be no doubt as to the issue; for "faithful is he that calleth you, who will also do it."

*This extract from Mr. Pember's work on "The Great Prophecies" is inserted here as an answer to many inquiries for it. We have not space to answer fully in The Mail-Bag department.

THE TEST OF DISCIPLESHIP.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Commencing Mar. 10. Luke 14:25-33.

ONE of the hardest of Christ's "hard savings" is this which is selected as the basis of the week's topic. On the surface, there seems something unnatural in it. Who would be a disciple, who would even be willing to be a candidate for discipleship if he can become eligible only by hating his father, mother, wife, and child? We ask in amazement, is it possible that a being so gentle, loving, and good, wished to surround himself with men who hated their nearest relations? We would despise men who did that, and would not have them for our friends. But Christ's meaning becomes clearer as we study the conditions of the people to whom he was speaking. With regard to them, the words were a statement of fact rather than an arbitrary law. They could not be Christ's disciples if they paid any regard to family obligations. Their fathers, mothers, and wives would naturally use whatever influence they had to prevent the sons and husbands becoming disciples. A man who had children would have to consider that if he became a disciple his children would suffer socially and materially. To become a disciple was to lose the respect of the community, to run the risk of being cast out of the synagogue, which was equivalent to excommunication. We can imagine how a mother would plead with her son, how the wife would plead with her husband, and beg him not to throw away his chances in life by joining the followers of the young Teacher. "If you do it," they would say as a final appeal, "you will show that you do not love me." The time must come inevitably when the disciple would regard the pleader as an enemy to his soul when he would have to choose between Christ and those dearest to him on earth. It was well that they should know this because many of them were looking forward to riches and honors as a result of following him. The time was near at hand when none would be bold enough to avow themselves his followers but those who cared for nothing in this world as they cared for him, who loved him as they loved nothing else. Many of those who heard him speak would have to face the alternative of denying him or losing their lives. They would have to balance their obligations and affections. On the one hand there would be their love of life and the interests of their loved ones, and on the other, death for Christ's sake. In choosing death they would treat all other claims than those of Christ with a disregard that was no exaggeration to speak of as, hate. It would require not only a martyr's courage but an obduracy to the appeals of affection that seemed like cruelty. This has cost many a pang. There is a famous picture which sets the conflict vividly before the eye. It is of an incident on the eve of the St. Bartholomew massacre. A beautiful girl, who knows what is impending, is trying to bind around her lover's arm the scarf, which will secure his immunity from the attack of the brutal soldiery, but which will imply that he is not a Huguenot. Her face is full of love and one can imagine how she is pleading with him; but while his arm encircles her in loving embrace, his hand holds the scarf firmly so that she cannot tie it. He will not wear the emblem which will save his life at the cost of his fidelity to Christ. The love in his face shows that it costs him more to deny her pleading than it will cost him to die under the blows of the executioners. But his love for Christ requires him to reject her appeal. Times have changed now, but the obligation is not relaxed. Love for Christ and obedience to him must still be the paramount motive in life. Many a young man has realized it as he has gone home to tell his father and mother that the hopes they have cherished of his being their support and comfort in their old age must be disappointed, for he loves Christ so much that he is going to leave them that he may preach him to the heathen. Many a business man has realized it when in some crisis, he could deliver himself from bankruptcy, with all that it implies to wife and children, by some false statement or some act that he knows to be wrong. The heroic has not lost its place in Christianity, and he who is not prepared to prove himself a hero cannot now, any more than in past time, be Christ's disciple.

THE JUNIORS AT WORK.

We learn from Miss M. Kay one of the officers of the Junior Societies of Christian Endeavor of New York City that the young folks are accomplishing an untold amount of good through the well-named "Sunshine Committee" to the poor. Literature and toys have been sent to orphan asylums. Hospitals are visited regularly, and articles taken to the sick children. Many Juniors have become interested in the work for sailors, and up to the present time a case of literature and seventy-one comfort-bags have been donated to this cause. In the Five Points House of Industry a Junior Society has been organized. This now numbers more than two hundred members, and is the largest Junior society in the metropolis. These unfortunate children take part in the society work with great eagerness, sometimes five or six, with open Bibles in their hands, spring to their feet at the same moment. Many of them add words of their own to the verses they read. Of course the children are poor, but from the gifts they receive from visitors many of them set aside liberal portions to use for missions. Already, though the Society is only a few months old, the members have sent five dollars to a home missionary in the West, and five dollars to Africa. Two of the girls of the society have promised that, after they have grown up and completed their education, they will go as missionaries to the heathen.

THREE PROMINENT B. Y. P. U. LEADERS.

REV. G. M. SHOTT. DR. L. A. CRANDALL. REV. HOWARD W. SMITH.

THREE B. Y. P. U LEADERS.

Much of the success that has attended the Young People's movement in the Baptist Church is due to the heartiness with which the pastors of the churches have introduced and encouraged it. In some instances they have given it their personal supervision and have given a great deal of time and trouble to making the meetings interesting and instructive. Three pastors who have done good service in the cause are those whose portraits are given on this page.

Rev. G. M. Shott of Fairmont, W. Va., is President of the State Union. He has been since his entrance on the ministry an earnest worker among the young people wherever his lot has been cast. Before the organization of the Christian Endeavor Society, he formed a young people's society at Louisville, Ky., and since he has been at Fairmont, W. Va., he has made the same kind of work one of his chief duties. He has cordially adopted the Christian Culture Courses, and has made his Union one of the most efficient in the State. The State Union is likely to make rapid progress under his presidency.

Rev. L. A. Crandall, D.D., pastor of the Memorial Baptist Church of Chicago, is also a veteran in the young people's work. He was active in the Christian Endeavor Society before the organization of the Baptist Union, and organized societies in the churches of which he was successively pastor in New York and Cleveland. Since his removal to Chicago he has become permanently identified with the B. Y. P. U., and has become a member of the executive committee of the National Union. Dr. Crandall is a native of New York State, and has been twenty-two years in the ministry. He has taken a prominent part in the international conventions of both the Christian Endeavor Society and the Baptist Young People's Union.

Rev. Howard Wayne Smith, the youngest memper of the trio, is only twenty-five years of age. He is a native of Philadelphia, and was first identified with Christian work in that city as Secretary of the Young People's Association of the Mantua Baptist Church there. He was also active in the Young Men's Christian Association. He attended the Chicago Convention at which the Baptist Young People's Union was organized, and took a prominenf part in the proceedings. Since that time he has entered the ministry, and is now pastor of the Baptist Church at Blackwood, N. J. He is president of the Associational Union of Camden, N. J,, and is exerting himself to raise a substantial contribution to the Founding Fund of the Union. Mr. Smith frequently testifies to the benefit he personally derived from his connection with young people's societies and is therefore enthusiastic in recommending them to the churches.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The local Christian Endeavor good-citizenship forces in Philadelphia, have became united with the reform political movement by the chairman, Rev. A. B. Philputt, accepting a proffered membership on the "Committee of 95," a body composed of many of the most prominent independent citizens. It is believed that the success of the Reform movement was largely due to their efforts.

The annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State was held last week at Syracuse, N. Y. The number of Associations to be represented was one hundred and fifty-two, with an aggregate membership of over forty thousand. Mr. John R. Mott attended for the International Committee. Among the speakers were Rev. R. A. Torrey, Dr. H. T. McEwen, Chancellor James R. Day and President J. G. Schurman.

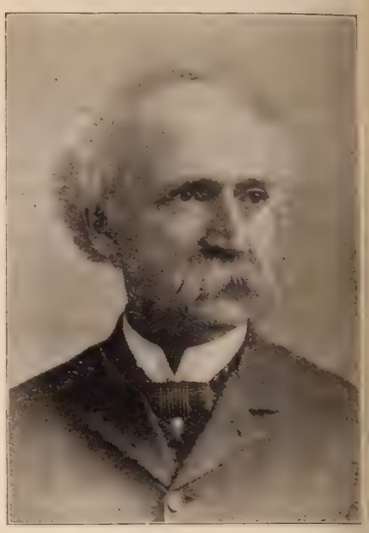
A Late Breakfast

is often caused by a late milkman. No cream for the coffee or oatmeal has delayed many a morning meal. Keep a supply of Borden's Peerless Brand Evaporated Cream in the house, and avoid such annoyances.

A VALIANT WORKER DEAD.

Mr. J. Ward Childs, Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, New York, called from Labor to Reward.

FEW residents of New York realized the full significance of the announcement in the daily papers of February 16th, that Mr. J. Ward Childs had died the day before of pneumonia. Mr. Childs had never been the kind of a man to court publicity or to seek for notoriety, either for himself or his work. Quiet, modest, unassuming, he went about his duties conscientiously and methodically as one careful to serve his Master faithfully, and careless about his own name and fame. Thus, it was only people interested in the rescue of the fallen who knew much of this persevering, strenuous man who with tireless patience was laboring so successfully in that cause. But those who did know him admired and revered him. To him, the words of the King commanding that the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind should be brought in from the streets and lanes of the city, had come as a personal call and he made it his life's work to obey it.



THE LATE MR. J. WARD CHILDS.

Probably in no street in the world are there so many of the class typified by the command to be found as in that famous thoroughfare of New York, called the Bowery. It is the Broadway of the slums, There Mr. Childs pitched his tent, and to these he addressed himself. The Bowery Mission was opened twelve years ago at No. 36 and when that house was sold, it was re-opened at 105. Mr. Childs admitted that the neighborhood was Satan's stronghold, but he believed with Paul that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation and he proclaimed it with all the intensity of his character. From the beginning, the services of the Bowery Mission have been marvels of triumph. It was not so much in the preaching, as in the personal conversation with the men who had been moved by the preaching, that the victories were won. The poor, miserable drunkard straying in with empty pockets seeking only a place to rest, with no hope in this world or the next, would hear Christ proclaimed would listen vacantly to the declaration that he could redeem men from sin and would put it aside as being something unattainable for him. But he would hear one and another testify that Christ had saved them, and he would be interested. That was the opportunity Mr. Childs waited for. The man would be treated kindly, encouraged, helped in many ways and always pointed to Christ, as the sinners' Friend and Saviour. It was not drunkenness, nor vice that was denounced, but sin. Christ could save from sin in all its many forms, and Mr. Childs would not be satisfied with the Temperance or any other pledge. He had no hope until the sinner was trusting in Christ. After that, the man found a friend in Mr. Childs, who would get him a position, beg clothing for him, or restore him to his family. In this glorious occupation he spent his days and nights, a busy, happy, faithful man. The poor will miss him sadly, and many a struggling man will feel that he has lost a friend.

Bosnia's Simple People.

The Quiet, Uneventful Lives of a Race of Tax-burdened Mountaineers — Quaint Costumes and Customs.

WHAT the Swiss mountaineer is to Eastern Europe, the native of Bosnia may be said to be to the west; with this difference, however, that while both have similarly picturesque and rugged surroundings, and both lead exceedingly simple lives, the Switzer is far in advance of the Bosnian in all that relates to civilization and modern progress. Something less than a full day's journey by rail from Vienna brings a traveler to the Bosnian hills, and to what has been till a comparatively recent date, a country little known to Europeans. It is a land where the Moslem power once ruled, but which has now the form at least of obedience to Austrian authority, although its costumes and customs have changed but little. Forest and mountain, valley and height, with here and there a turbulent stream dashing in white foam through a gorge, or a river tearing its way along the precipitous hillsides, give an aspect of wild grandeur to the scenery. It is a country that would delight the artistic eye and sense almost as much as the Tyrol.

Turbaned men labor in the fields, and women with garments that recall the figures one sees in Turkish villages are met at intervals. In the villages the "muezzin," or Mohammedan call to prayer, is regularly intoned, and in the few more pretentious towns, like Serajevo and Jajace, white mosques and minarets glisten in the sunlight. It is as though the Alps had been transferred to the Orient. Gigantic among its fellows, Mount Trebevic towers nearly 5000 feet high, and overlooks Serajevo, the capital, while a score of other peaks of from 3000 to 4000 feet, form a mountain wall almost encircling the city.

Of the 30,000 population in the capital, fully one-half are Moslems, the remainder being orthodox Greeks and Christians. In the streets of Serajevo one sees the same characteristic groups of sidewalk merchants and artisans, with their wares spread out in front of their shops, that are found in Cairo and other Eastern cities. Donkeys loaded with merchandise, veiled women bargaining with the venders of jewelry and silks, obstruct the thoroughfares, but amid all the activity there is that entire absence of haste which one never fails to notice in old-world communities. But it is in the country, amid the mountain passes and winding roads that one finds the true types of the Bosnian people. Their houses are, for the most part, rude dilapidated structures, that may have stood for generations and have never been repaired. Furniture is of the roughest sort, made for endurance rather than for comfort or elegance. Education is a thing unknown save to the very few. Railways, the wonders of great cities, and the modern improvements of civilization are strange to the rural population of the country. The people are hard but willing toilers, and the burden of Moslem taxation has kept them poor and ignorant. Until 1878, Bosnia was a Turkish "vilayet," or dependency, but it is now a province of the Ottoman Empire, occupied and administered by Austria. It is only on the plains that agriculture can be carried on to any considerable extent, but the taxes have made it an unprofitable industry. The gypsies and a semi-nomad people, called the Morlachs, dig for lead, quicksilver, coal, and iron, but owing to the general oppression of all classes, even these industries cannot be developed.

Brave and hardy, yet crafty and cruel, the native Bosnians are not as hospitable to strangers as could be wished. They are simple in their home habits, and peaceful among themselves. Their women are less restricted than is usual in Moslem countries, and appear unveiled in public, in the country districts at least. Both sexes have the strongly-marked features and bronzed complexion of mountaineers, and their country is a healthful one and conducive to longevity. Our illustration shows a typical Bosnian husband and wife, such as are to be found almost anywhere among the small villages and hamlets along the banks of the Verbas, the Bosna, and the Drin.

Brightening a Dull Home.

How a group of loving children brightened and sublimated a dull and worldly home, and brought therein the spirit of Christian love and cheerfulness, is told in this anecdote: A husband and wife had for years been bent on making money. If they bought, it was to add something to their wealth; if they sold, it was that they could have so much more to invest. Under such a plan it was impossible for the house to have any other air than that of a place of business, or work, its character as a place of culture, where the mind and higher nature should have higher enjoyment and expansion, being left entirely out of sight; and the parents and even the children seemed to grow up in sympathy with the rougher aspects of life, caring nothing for that which is beautiful and improving. But the girls grew up toward young womanhood and found themselves longing for something better than their home afforded them. Their hearts were craving for intelligence, feeling, and congeniality with a better life. They grew tired of the moil and toil of money-making. Gradually, but surely, they began their work of reformation, and by skilful management changed the whole life of the household. Its rigors began to relax. Books, newspapers, music, and other attractions had a gradual introduction, and flowers bloomed, and spread their fragrance about the door-yard. Nor was the culture of the heart forgotten. The father and mother entered into a new life that thrust itself upon them, and though never, perhaps, blaming themselves for their earlier behavior and experience, they were glad to acknowledge themselves happy amid the pleasures that had been brought them by their children. It was a noble mission nobly fulfilled.

Idle Words.

It has been wisely said that in the conservation of forces, there is never a word lost in the universe. Even idle words have their results. They may be spoken thoughtlessly, and forgotten quickly, by the speaker, but they have entered the forces of the universe, and they shall be doing a work that we and others shall find the consequences of eternally.

Never a word is spoken,
But it trembles in the air,
And the truant voice has sped,
To vibrate everywhere;
And perhaps far off in eternal years
The echo may ring upon our ears.

In view of this truth, what added force there is in the saying of Jesus, "I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment."

A Novel "Birthday Party."

One of the latest and pleasantest ways of conducting a "sociable" among church members, and at the same time serving a practical purpose, is explained in the following poetic missive, which has been sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mrs. Fannie Justus, of the Ladies' Aid Society, of Wright City, Mo.:

This "Birthday Party" is given to you;
'Tis something novel, 'tis something new.
We send you each a little sack—
Please either send or bring it back,
With as many cents as years are old;
We promise the number shall never be told.
Kind friends will give you something to eat,
And others will furnish a musical treat.
The Ladies' Aid, with greetings most hearty,
Feel sure you'll attend "Your own Birthday Party."

Each letter is accompanied by a tiny sack of muslin, tied by a bit of bright ribbon. Every one who attends the "Party," is expected to put into his or her sack a penny for every year of life. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent its sack to the ladies of Wright City, as requested.

MUSIC AT HOME.

WHEN the winter evenings are long and blustery, every one who has a home feels like poking the fire and making a social circle around the family hearthstone. The pleasures that go to brighten and shorten these hours must largely come from the individual members of the home group, writes Estelle Mendell in "The Musical Messenger." This is especially true in isolated country localities, where the neighbors are few and far between, and where a friendly "run in of an evening" involves the hitching up of a team, etc. Many such a family I know dreads the weary monotony of such evenings. Even the savory popcorn and luscious apples, with an occasional game, hardly serve to give sufficient variety to the standard employment of "reading," "mending," "darning," and "piecing quilts." Still I dare say that in the majority of these homes there is some kind of a musical instrument and a musician or musicians of varied ability, whose powers to entertain and cheer have been slightly developed.

Now, just open and dust that organ or piano, have it tuned and fixed if it need be, and invite your daughter or son or wife to "give you a tune." Or, possibly, you "took a few lessons" in your younger days. Then recall "Money-Musk" or "Home, Sweet Home," and rally the singers around the chords of some good, old-fashioned, familiar song.

You will have no idea how it will sweeten and brighten the atmosphere. Father will forget his crankiness, the tired, weary look on mother's face will give way to a smile, and all "bickerings" and "spells" will vanish as mist before the sun.

With very little effort and planning, there can be an entertaining and also a profitable home concert of an hour or more every evening; and can you realize the feeling of importance it would give the young folks to be made the "programme committee?" It would bring out new talents, and the worthy ambition it would incite might keep them from low and questionable pleasures.

Opportunity.

A sculptor, said Rev. Dr. Hudson, of Minneapolis, in a recent sermon, once showed a visitor his studio. It was full of gods. One was very curious. The face was concealed by being covered with hair and there were wings on each foot. "What is its name?" said the spectator. "Opportunity," was the reply. "Why is his face hidden?" "Because men seldom know him when he comes to them." "Why has he wings on his feet?" "Because he is soon gone and once gone can never be overtaken."

Sod Homes in the West.

Rev. G. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary who is now distributing aid among the destitute in Kansas, sends this description of a typical Kansas sod house:

"What is the difference between a dug-out and a sod house? Simply this—the former is built in the ground, the latter on top of the ground. We stopped at a dug-out. The material of the house is nearly all sod; it has some wooden supports, also the door and the floor are wood. The location is 'dug-out' of a little hill-side. The sod had been cut in squares, about five or six inches thick, and about 15x15 inches square, and coated inside with a white plaster which is obtained from quarries in many parts of this country. There was an air of neatness in the house, and being partly under the hill, and having thick walls, it was quite warm. The 'dug-out' answers its purpose in cold and dry weather, but is a poor protection in a rainy season, especially after the sod becomes rotten, when it washes and crumbles.

"As I sat in the dugout I asked, 'What did you raise last year?' 'Nothing,' was the answer. I suppose my looks betrayed my amazement. I asked, 'What did you try to raise?' 'Corn and vegetables.' He said he had a fine prospect till the drought and hot winds set in, and everything was blasted. His wife added, 'We did get two little messes of peas.' Our fleet-footed bronchos brought us rapidly back to the village, and none too soon; for a storm of snow and piercing wind had begun."

A NEW-FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

BY MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XLII.

Ye are the light of the world.

TO bear fruit, to bring other souls to the Saviour, what Christian has not felt that longing! Annie's heart was full of it. She pined for this, prayed for it, planned for it, worked for it. More than all, she had longed for the salvation of her beloved brother. What joy it was to her then, to listen to his avowal. There was so much in him that was lovable and noble, this one thing lacking was peculiarly sad. She knew that he misunderstood Christ and his religion; for had he rightly understood, his own nature would have quickly responded. But then she, too, had misunderstood at one time. Her eyes had been opened and she longed that he, too, might see. But his scepticism had been an impenetrable cloud around him. Again and again she had tried to get him to look at Christ in his true light and had failed. There was this discrepancy in the Bible; there was that apparent contradiction; there were difficulties here and there which he wanted solved before he would look at religion at all. So he had remained aloof, for Annie being no theologian could not solve the difficulties for him. But she lived in the light herself and it now seemed according to Roy's own account that light had radiated from her. Truly, it seemed that in her case, the spirit of man had been the candle of the Lord, as the wise king said. It had given light to Roy. It had been feeble, as Annie sorrowfully acknowledged to herself; but it must have been divine in essence, however small in quantity, otherwise, it could not have guided her brother. Oh, that now he might be led into the full light of the Sun of Righteousness!

Left to herself, for Roy, with many apologies for breaking off the interview, had gone to keep an appointment, Annie's eyes wandered around the dear old room familiar to her from childhood. It was full of associations with father, mother and old times. How many changes had come since the days when as a girl she had passed hours there reading and building castles in the air. The castles had all dissolved into the air out of which they were made, but Annie saw in their stead "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." How much better that was! Would that her brother and her mother, too, might have title to enter there! Poor mother! So much trouble, so much sorrow and disappointment and without the rich consolation that she might have in Christ! Annie's head sank on her hands and her heart poured itself out in prayer for the two loved ones. It gave her repose of mind for she was committing to One who hears and answers, the desire she had no power to accomplish. Both brother and mother she commended to the love of God and somehow, in an indefinable way, assurance came to her that her prayer was heard.

She raised her head and found that her cheeks were wet with tears, but they were not tears of sorrow. They were merely the womanly expression of the intensity of her emotions. But others might think that she was sad and that must not be on this festival day, especially now that she had learned how much depended on her demeanor. So she washed away the dewy stains and rearranged her hair. Roy's words were a reminder to her and she felt that they would be so all her life, calling her to let her light shine that others might see in her how blissful a thing religion was.

And was she not happy and with good cause? All day her heart was full of thanksgiving. She had almost lost sight of her benevolent plans, of the fact that her brother had so readily promised the money so that she might carry out her scheme, this was secondary to the one thing, that Roy wanted to be a Christian. The fact that it was brought about by her beautiful life and consistent deportment did not fill her with spiritual pride, she lived too near her Saviour for that. She had requested help from her brother before, and while he had granted it, it was not done in the whole-hearted way in which he had acceded to her present proposition. All day her thoughts were full of Roy. Late in the afternoon she stole into the library and opening the organ began singing from her full heart. At first hymns of thanksgiving fell from her lips and she sang and sang regardless of the lapse of time. It was nothing strange for her to sing thus and she was not disturbed. Later, as she thought how many souls had been lost who had been "almost persuaded," a sigh escaped her, and almost unconsciously she began the song of the "closed door." Plaintively she wailed out the bitter refusal—

No light had we: for that we do repent:
And, learning this, the Bridegroom will relent.
"Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now."
No light, so late! and dark and chill the night!
Oh, let us in, that we may find the light!
"Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now."

As she finished the last of the sad words, a sob behind her caused her to turn, and there upon the sofa sat her mother weeping.

"Mamma, dear mamma, what is the matter?" and Annie knelt and put her arms around her.

"Oh, my child, we are parted forever. You are gone, and somehow I feel that Roy is leaving me, too. Down the hill, all by myself I am going into eternal night. 'Lost, lost,' you sang it, the requiem of my lost soul."

"Dear mamma, Jesus came to seek and save the lost. He came to save you, won't you let him do it?"

"No, not me. He did not come to save me, everybody else but not me. I am too old he will not save me. Fifty long years have I lived for myself, how could I offer him these last few, feeble years, as I go totteringly down the hill. My best days I kept for myself, could I offer the ravelled ends of a misspent life to him? What an insult it would be to him, the great God of Heaven! Oh, I see now what a mistaken life I have lived for fifty years. 'Too late,' you said it, and it is 'too late' for me."

Amid sobs and tears the words were uttered, and Annie knew her mother was fully stirred. She was happy but she tried to smother her delight, knowing that it would be cruel to rejoice over such sorrow, yet in her heart she was happy to hear her mother declare herself "lost forever," to hear her talk of the "ravelled ends of a misspent life." The Holy Spirit was at work, his arrows of conviction were ahead. Now she could hope for the first time. Tenderly she pointed her mother to a crucified Saviour, so willing to receive her as she was, so able to take the poor "ravelled ends" of her life and weave them into a web of glory for himself, so loving that he would encircle her in his arms as she "tottered down the hill" where at the foot she would not plunge into "eternal night," but find a heaven of rest and joy and love. Then that child, the once leader of fashion and pet of society, trained in God's own school of discipline, knelt and prayed for that mother who had never taught her to lisp a prayer. Annie was grieved to leave her mother in darkness, but night was creeping on and she was compelled to return home. She left her in God's hands, sure that all would soon be well.

When she reached her gate Dr. Gordon met her, and from her full heart she exclaimed before he could say a word:

"Oh, I am glad to see you, dear. I have never spent a happier day in my life. Only think how good God is to me: my cup truly runs over, and I am so undeserving of it all. In the first place, Roy seemed so glad to grant me the favor I asked him; he even did better than I asked. His heart was mellow; I saw it as soon as I spoke of God's goodness to him; his eyes were even humid, and when I asked him if he would grant me this favor as a little thankoffering to my Saviour, he consented without a moment's hesitation. Then he confessed to me that he was no longer sceptical, and, only think of it, said it was the change in me that had convinced him of the truth of the Christian religion, and said he would be glad to be a Christian, for my Saviour to be his Saviour. Oh, Roy is not far from the kingdom of heaven. What happiness to feel this! But this is not all. I left dear mamma in deep repentance over her past life. She said she had lived fifty years in sin, and when I pointed her to a loving, willing Saviour, she talked of her remaining days as 'the ravelled ends of a misspent life,' and felt it would be insulting to God to offer it to him, when she had spent all the best part for herself. It was piteous to behold her, to see her grey head bowed in sorrow, to hear her weep and wail over a sinful life—but Oh, I was so happy,—don't you know it has been one of the very happiest days of my life?"

"Yes, my darling, I know it must have been so and my full heart rejoices with you. The Holy Spirit is at work in that house, and thank God for it! Poor beggars that we are, we will keep begging. Who can doubt that prayer will avail? Who can doubt the power of Christian example? Who can doubt God's gracious promises? I knew that your prayers would be answered. I tried to pray, too, but my dear Annie, I had more faith in your prayers than in my own. I am not surprised that your life, your godly walk, has convinced Roy of the false platform upon which he stood, and that he has seen a reality in the religion you profess. What a power for good Roy will be! Oh, that the good day will speedily come when your mother, Roy and his wife will all be sitting at Jesus' feet!"

"I feel too happy to sleep to-night. I wish I could go right down now to Mrs. Somers and tell her the glorious news."

"The 'glorious news' will keep till morning, dear. Such news is always new, it can never grow stale. It is the old story, but it is ever new. You will not rejoice any the less after a night of refreshing sleep."

CHAPTER XLIII.

Growth not change.

The next morning as soon as breakfast was over and the house in order, Annie put on her hat and her feet fairly took wings. As soon as she could take breath, she began a detailed account of her plan for the children to be taught by poor, afflicted Mrs. Hunter, and of her hope that her brother might be induced to assume the responsibility and expense of her plan. Then she told of the invitation to celebrate her mother's fiftieth birthday at his house the day before, of taking Roy aside and unfolding her plan, of his glad acquiescence, giving her even more than she asked, of his contrition and desire to be a Christian, of her mother's distress over her former life, of her present despair because she felt too unworthy for God to notice—all this she told rapidly and then with a burst of feeling, exclaimed: "Oh magnify the Lord with me and let us exalt his name together," and Mrs. Somers continued: "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless his holy name."

"Do you remember, Mrs. Somers, a conversation which we once held upon 'growth in grace?'"

"Yes, dear, it was years ago, but I remember it well. You were a babe in Christ then, and I well remember how anxious you were to know whether you were growing or not, and how your mind was exercised upon the word 'progress.'"

"Indeed, I remember it well. It has all come back to me lately, my old fears and anxieties. I have been reading lately on the 'higher life' and 'rest of faith,' and I am intensely interested in these things. Have you read upon the subject, Mrs. Somers?"

"Yes, Annie, I have read many books, papers, and tracts, pertaining to this subject and my conclusion is, after several years of study, that the advocates of this belief have fallen into some errors."

"Do tell me what these errors are, Mrs. Somers, for I do not want to fall into any more errors than I do now. Sanctification seems to me a most desirable condition, and this they profess to enjoy, and to teach how to obtain."

"If I understand correctly their position, Annie, they preach self-perfection, claim to be free from the power of sin. They declare that they lie passive in God's hands, knowing no will but his, and that this state can be entered into instantaneously. Conversion they say is a sudden change, so also is sanctification. They tell you you must believe, you try hard, you cannot and are overwhelmed in distress. They virtually tell you to stretch out your withered hand, you say, I cannot unless God gives me the power. You try, the power is wanting, and you are in despair."

"I wish I understood it perfectly, for if their wills are really submerged in the divine will, I only long to join them."

"Once, Annie, this subject interested me more than any other. I read everything that came in my way appertaining to it. I made it a rule to read an article each night on this subject before retiring, and I was constantly exclaiming all through the day while at my work, 'Oh, for this rest of faith!' It seemed a very sweet rest to me, and so desirable for the Christian. A friend said to me one day:

"'Have you conversed with your pastor upon this 'higher life,' which occupied so much of your thoughts?'

"'No,' I replied. 'My heart argues for this, my heart's arguments far outweigh in my opinion, my pastor's philosophy theology and experience.'

"So I wept on, and prayed on. I have thrown myself upon my bed in earnest unrestings and cries for faith. I prayed earnestly, but I was not transformed, I felt no sanctifying change. My father was a minister of decided ability and devotedly pious so, in my distress, I wrote to him for his opinion, sending him works and papers upon this subject. Fearing that I was falling into error, he wrote to me at length.

"I remember his letter well. It set the matter so clearly before me that I have not been distressed about it since. My father showed me that I had been seeking the joy of faith, rather than faith itself and that the rest of faith was better than its joy. As to the description Paul gives in the seventh chapter of Romans of the struggle within him, which had been variously explained to me, my father said that he was convinced by his study, as well as by his own experience, that the conflict was not all a past experience, but was present with Paul when he wrote. Nevertheless, Paul's freedom from condemnation dated from the beginning, not the end, of the conflict. Finally my father assured me from his personal experience and from his knowledge of other people, acquired in his ministry, that the blessing we call sanctification is a process commencing at conversion and continuing until death and that in praying for, and looking for, some instantaneous change such as occurs at conversion I was only preparing myself for disappointment or self-delusion. 'It is growth not change,' he said 'that you must expect and I should be sorry if you ever fancied that you had reached a stage beyond which no further attainment was possible.' I give this so fully, Annie, because I am convinced my father was right and I hope it may save you, as it saved me from the distressing thought that a blessing was being withheld from me."

"That is a very different view from the one taken by the authors whose books I have been reading. They seem to me to imply if they do not explicitly claim that Christ keeps them absolutely free from sin and they seem to have Scriptural ground for the belief that such a thing is possible. In one of the Epistles of John it is stated clearly that whoso is born of God doth not commit sin. O, Mrs. Somers, that is a dreadful passage to me. I know I commit sin and it makes me feel that I am not born of God."

"Yes," said Mrs. Somers, "I remember the passage and it has puzzled me often. But is it not a curious thing that in the very same epistle there is another passage that seems to contradict it directly? The Apostle says, 'If we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us.' I think he must have had Paul's idea of the two natures in his mind. The natural one that sins and the divine one, given by conversion, which cannot sin. I see no other way of reconciling the two statements."

"You have had a long experience, Mrs. Somers; have you known a person who lived a perfectly sinless life?"

"No, I cannot say that I have. And here there is a significant thing. The best people I have known, the people that seem to me nearest to perfection always confessed themselves to be imperfect and deplored their sins of commission and omission, while people who seemed to me very imperfect claimed perfection. I don't want to be uncharitable, but it does seem to me that Christians must be very blind to their themselves sinless."

To be Concluded.

IN THE "LAND OF GOSHEN."

A traveler thus describes a recent journey rough the ancient "Land of Goshen:" As our train went through the country. e could now understand better than ever fore why the children of Israel in the wilrness remembered and longed for the elons of Egypt. We noted fifteen stations ong the line, Ryagazig and one or two hers being towns of considerable importce. It is now generally understood that e Scripture Goshen comprises a narrow lley of cultivated soil, with desert on both les. This valley is now one of the most autiful districts in Egypt, the fertile land ing covered with luxuriant crops, numers sheep and cattle, large groves of datelms and populous villages. We saw one rd containing probably four hundred mels, grazing; and on the back of one, ing eastward, we counted five women d a number of small children. On the ck of donkeys we saw men riding who ere larger than the donkeys. When our ain stopped at a station Egyptian girls me alongside the windows with earthen gs on their heads, saying "moyeh," the rabic word for water, which they hoped sell to the passengers, as this train did t carry drinking water."

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitute. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. WANTED AGENTS to sell Sash Locks & Door Holders. Sample Sash Lock free by mail for 30c. stamps. Best sellers ever invented. Beats weights. $12 a day. BROHARD & CO., Box 106, Philadelphia.

NOT ELEGIBLE.

An apt illustration is given in an historical work of Christ's words to the rich young ruler: One thing thou lackest. A wealthy young Italian noble of the last century was insulted and grievously wronged by his king. His fellow lords seeing he was out of favor at court slighted him. In his exasperation he joined one of the famous secret societies which was pledged to revolution. He was received gladly. The young man was enthusiastic and anxious to rise to the head of the society. His birth and wealth and abilities gave him, he thought, the right to a seat at the council table, if not to be one of the three executive members who commanded the Order. But he was not promoted. He was surprised and asked one of the executive members the reason. "The place is not for such as you," was the reply. "It is only for those who have given up everything for the Order and have sacrificed all they possess. You could not do that; you have too much. Be satisfied with your subordinate place. It would cost you too much to qualify for the high grade."

"I SHALL NOT PASS AGAIN."

THE bread that bringeth strength I want to give,
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day,
I sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give good measure running o'er,
And into angry hearts I want to pour
The answer soft that turneth wrath away,
I sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give to others hope and faith;
I want to do all that the Master saith;
I want to live aright from day to day,
I sure I shall not pass again this way.
